Lost Words and Lost Worlds Allan Pred, 1990-04-19 The last quarter of the nineteenth century was the most dramatic era in the social and spatial transformation of Stockholm During this time large scale manufacturing industry rose and eclipsed small scale artisan sectors of production the city s population virtually doubled and there was a rapid extension and rebuilding of the urban fabric Allan Pred reconstructs this transformation of Stockholm s local economy civil society and built environment between 1880 and 1900 through an interpretation of lost elements of language or forgotten fragments of daily discourse of lost words and meanings that belonged to members of the working and periodically employed classes His analysis reveals that a language of production distribution and consumption practices subsumed a language of discipline avoidance and survival tactics He demonstrates that the folk geography or language used for negotiating the city streets and getting from here to there subsumed a language of ideological resistance that a language of social reference and address the tagging of nicknames on groups and individuals subsumed a language of boundary transgression and that these languages were cross cut by folk humour by a vocabulary of comic irony and irreverence
