ENDANGERED? Dr. Y.P.S. Pundir , For the first time in human history in recent years Western HIMALAYAN BIODIVERSITY as a whole is endangered and more than 10% species of the flowering plants of this region are threatened due to modern man s intervention with the environment in the name of development industrialization urbanization rehabilitation etc In addition to this to meet the increasing demand of the modern civilized population of the plains for raw plant materials a large number of forest species are over exploited and many of them are now threatened Secondly increasing human population with time in the Himalayan hills and also the increasing population of their cattle and goats have also exerted great biotic pressure which is increasing day by day on the forest cover and this has further strengthen the threat Although WESTERN HIMALAYAN BIODIVERSITY as a whole is threatened DOON VALLEY one of the largest valley in the world is facing the worst situation This valley due to its natural boundaries within which it is enclosed the Himalayan mountains Mussoorie hills in the north and Siwalik hills in the south which are always in view and on its two sides being bounded by two most important and holy rivers Ganga Ganges and Jamuna Yamuna is considered among the most beautiful valleys in the world Moreover it is also famous from prehistoric days for its natural heritage and valuable plant wealth with a very rich and diversified flora with more than 1600 species of the flowering plants which include both tropical and temperate elements The species are significant from the scientific cultural and utilization viewpoints as they grow in a wide range of habitats marshes swamps

humid shady places and on extremely dry parts of steep ridges and hills which provided great ecological diversity In brief a very few areas in India can claim to have such a diversified range of plants of indigenous and exotic origin as Dehradun Saharanpur Siwaliks and Mussoorie hills Western Himalayas Unfortunately biodiversity of this region of Western Himalaya as a whole is endangered In other words a biodiversity crisis has developed in last few decades because in past 40 year an appreciable part of Doon Valley land has been cleaned for rehabilitation urbanization and industrialization and a large number of species have been extracted in most unplanned manner resulting in a sudden fall in their population Thus some time back the seriousness of the problem forced the environmentalists to declare this region as ecological fragile Thus realizing the need of time in past 3 4 decades HIMALAYAN BIODIVERSITY has been the subject of much discussion in seminars and conferences which gave birth to voluminous writings Unfortunately all these discussions and suggestions on plant diversity remained on paper So far concerted practical attempts have not been made in any part of Western Himalayas to conserve the endemic endangered and non commercial rare wild plant species in situ and ex situ Therefore many species have reached in the danger zone of extinction or have disappeared from the flora of the region Thus realizing the urgent need of time the work to conserve some non commercial forest wild species was taken up some time back in 1997 2001 As far as I am aware this was the first work of its kind on Western Himalayan Biodiversity which aimed to conserve in real sense in situ as well as ex situ some non commercial but endangered and rare wild plant species of Doon Valley Saharanpur Siwaliks and lower Mussoorie hills Pittosporum eriocarpum Royle which is endemic in a very small part of Uttarakhand hills Western Himalayas in Doon Valley Lower Mussoorie hills and rarely in a small part of Kumaon hills is detailed here The book with more than 100 color photographs and distribution maps is prepared to high light A to Z known facts about this disappearing species cited below
