

Desired family size and son preference among Hispanic women of low socioeconomic status.

by Jennifer B. Unger and Gregory B. Molina

A preference for sons is expressed by Hispanic women taking part in a survey conducted through a Los Angeles obstetrics and gynecology clinic. Of 432 women ages 18-50 surveyed, participants indicated they wanted an average of 2.8 sons compared to 0.1 daughters. Mothers most likely to desire sons included those older than 30, women with no more than an eighth grade education, single mothers, women who preferred to speak Spanish rather than English, those who were born outside the United States, and women who came from a large family.

Among 432 Hispanic women aged 18-50 interviewed at a Los Angeles obstetrics and gynecology clinic, respondents reported wanting an average of 2.8 sons but only 0.1 daughters. Being older than 30, having no more than an eighth grade education, being separated, divorced or widowed, being Spanish-speaking or having been born outside the United States, and having a large family of origin were all positively associated with a desire for a greater number of sons. A multivariate analysis indicated that women who preferred to speak Spanish were 10.9 times as likely as those who preferred English to desire a greater number of sons, and those with more children were 2.5 times as likely as those with fewer children to have a strong desire for sons. Family planning programs for Hispanics may be more effective if they acknowledge this important motive for childbearing.

(Family Planning Perspectives, 29:284-287, 1997)

The Hispanic population in the United States is approximately 22.3 million.[1] They are the fastest-growing minority group in the country, and by the year 2000, they will be its largest ethnic minority.[2] One factor contributing to the rapid increase in the U.S. Hispanic population is the high birthrate among Hispanics relative to rates among other ethnic groups: In 1990, Hispanics had 107.7 live births per 1,000 women aged 15-44, compared with 67.1 births per 1,000 among non-Hispanics.[3] Although Hispanics comprise only 9% of the population of women aged 15-44 in the United States, they account for 12.5% of all births[4]. Moreover, Hispanic mothers are twice as likely as white mothers to give birth to a fourth (or higher order) child.[5]

The high birthrate and large family size among Hispanics are usually attributed to lack of knowledge about and access to contraceptives.[6] Hispanics are less likely than whites to use contraceptives or family planning services,[7] and research has suggested that language barriers, poverty and a male-dominated culture are obstacles to the effective practice of contraception.[8] These findings imply that Hispanic women would choose to limit their fertility if they had the required knowledge and resources.

However, a woman's intention to have additional children is one of the most important predictors of childbearing.[9] and evidence suggests that Hispanics traditionally desire large families[10] and place great cultural importance on motherhood.[11] Many Hispanic women believe that bearing large numbers of children will fulfill their expected female role and will ensure that they have someone to care for them and support them financially in their old age.[12] The expected social prestige and security associated with motherhood may outweigh the potential financial difficulties entailed in raising a large family. Thus, women who desire large families may be unwilling to practice contraception even if they are provided with contraceptives and educated about their proper use.[13] However, evidence in support of this notion is mixed.[14]

Son preference, which has been documented in various traditional cultures around the world,[15] may also influence contraceptive use among Hispanics. In cultures where women desire large numbers of sons, those who have not yet had a son typically do not practice contraception until they have had at least one.[16] For example, in Taiwan, women who already had sons were more likely to use reliable methods of birth control and to consider the use of abortion than were women who had no sons.[17]

If son preference is present among Hispanic women in the United States, then family size among Hispanic couples may be large because couples continue to bear children until they have had a son. Programs that simply provide information about and access to contraceptives may not be effective in convincing such women to limit childbearing.
