

Integrated Health Care System: Meeting Global Health Care Needs in the 21st Century

Nat Quansah

Abstract

The Integrated Health Care System is presented as an appropriate system capable of helping meet global health care needs in a satisfactory manner. It is a system that consciously targets and harnesses peoples' links with biodiversity for health reasons. It is an integrative and positive tool blending health, economic, and biological and cultural diversity conservation needs of people and their area, all at the same time.

Results from a study of health care conducted from 1993 through 1997 at the 'Clinique de Manongarivo', a pilot rural health center in northwest Madagascar practicing the Integrated Health Care System approach, are used as evidence of the viability of this system. In conclusion a call is made for re-thinking and re-acting of health policies to implement the system in other countries.

"HEALTH FOR ALL BY THE YEAR 2000". A laudable goal set by The World Health Organization (WHO) which unfortunately never became a reality. But we all aspire for GOOD HEALTH. This aspiration holds true for the individual, the family, the community, the country and the world as a whole. But why are we not achieving GOOD HEALTH FOR ALL? Many factors can be attributed to this failure, not least, the neglect of traditional medical systems. In many countries traditional medical systems are ignored as a result of the adoption of modern medical systems as the officially recognized medical systems.

The Integrated Health Care System (IHCS), a system that combines the resources (human and material) of different medical systems of an area in a complementary manner is the focus of this article. The IHCS has been studied from 1993 through 1997 in a pilot health care center in Madagascar: 'Clinique de Manongarivo'. Results from this pilot study are used in the following discussion to demonstrate how this system facilitates not only health care needs but also economic as well as biological and cultural diversity conservation needs of a people and their living area.

Health Policies: Adopting Modern Medical Systems

Health policies in most countries (especially in developing countries) have often favored the adoption and development of modern medical systems while tolerating, belittling, neglecting or banning the existing (traditional) medical systems. This scenario, I believe, is the result of misconceptions arising from ignorance on the part of health authorities and administrators, modern medical personnel, scientists, and policy makers of the roles of the various medical systems, especially the traditional medical system as a profession and traditional medical practitioners as professionals. The situation may also be motivated, at times, by personal economic gains on the part of some proponents of modern medical systems. Proponents may include policy makers, pharmaceutical product manufacturers as well as health authorities and adminis-
