an extraordinary thing for there were galley slaves who assumed my name I was the general to whom all the deeds of his soldiers is attributed they did not cite the places I had taken by assault but there was no jailor whose vigilance I could not escape no irons that I could not break through no wall that I could not penetrate I was no less famed for courage and skill and it was the general opinion that I was capable of any deed of renown in case of need At Brest at Toulon at Rochefort in fact everywhere I was considered amongst robbers as the most cunning and most bold The most villainous sought my friendship because they thought there was still something to be learnt from me and the greatest novices collected my very words as instructions from which they could gather profit At BicStre I had a complete court and they pressed around me surrounded me and made tenders of services and kind offers and expressed regards of which it would be difficult to form an idea But now this prison glory was hateful to me the more I read the souls of malefactors the more they laid themselves open to me the more I pitied society for having nourished in its bosom such offspring I no longer felt that sentiment of the community of misfortune which had formerly inspired my breast cruel experience and a riper age had convinced me of the necessity of withdrawing myself from these brigands whose society I loathed and whose language was an abomination to me Decided at any event to take part against them for the interest of honest men I wrote to M Henry to offer my services afresh without any other condition than that of not being taken back to the Bagne resigning myself      Memoirs of Vidocq, etc.
