

The Second Coming of Steven Jobs

*He and his disciples live by the word:
any dream is possible; once is not enough; and there's no rest for the driven*

■ By JOSEPH NOCERA

You can find innovation in Silicon Valley. They are young and unattached and usually men. They have jeans and T-shirts, and they live in little one-room apartments. You see them early in the morning, driving up Route 88 toward the open, ugly buildings that serve as offices in the Valley, and you see them late in the afternoon, leaving their offices, one-by-one, out of these same buildings late at night. Almost always, their briefcases are bulging with things they need to work on at home, after hours.

To an outside, they can seem a little odd, these people who are drawn to Silicon Valley. Certainly they are single-minded, for although the Valley is made to money, that is not what has drawn them here, first really. The Valley is filled with money houses, but that does not move them either. They are not here to find love or to enjoy their leisure time. They have come here to work, and they are happiest when they are getting to their laptops early in front of their computer terminals. Much is what excites them, what fuels them. Those who consider themselves the leaders are the people who work for the small, or self-named, companies, the "start-ups," where every hour counts and where the intensity of the work environment is as powerful and as addicting as any drug. Maybe that's not so odd. We live, after all, in a culture in which an increasingly
