

These phases (encode–represent–process–implement) succeed one another almost linearly in the solving, that is, when solving a problem, one goes sequentially through them. This assertion includes the fact that depending on the solver's expertise, some phases might be implicit. The recursiveness of the framework has an important consequence: students' mistakes in one of the phases indicate a failure at a certain stage of the solving. Consequently, teachers can thus obtain patterns of students' problem-solving competence.

Being aware of this four-phase framework for problem solving, the teacher can pose specific problems that distinctively focus on one of the phases, or more precisely, problems that allow some phases to be implicit, while only one or two need attention and more detailed analysis and description. Thus, the framework can be used by teachers in order to orient their PP activity towards certain values of the parameters involved in a problem in order to focus relevant educational purposes.

In particular, the PS conceptual framework can be used in devising relevant distractors for multiple choice problems. In the absence of a paper and pencil test in which participants write down detailed solutions, or of face-to-face interviews, the above analysis identifies from the multitude of possible distractors, the one that potentially reveals a fundamental mistake at each phase of the PS process. Therefore, this framework has potential for posing multiple choice questions—a category of PP that is of great interest. More specific, the design of questions according to this four-phase framework allows teachers to offer consistent feedback on multiple choice written examinations.

Of course, not all problems have unique ways of approaching them and many do not allow anticipation of the solving trajectory. However, part of the art of teaching is to choose learning tasks that match the learning goals. Therefore, the problems posed as tasks should be relevant for effective assessment, in order to detect the students' range of abilities and orchestrate appropriate training.
