Patients' perspectives on what works in psychoeducational groups for schizophrenia

A qualitative study

Received: 17 April 2007 / Accepted: 30 July 2007 / Published online: 24 August 2007

Abstract Background: Psychoeducational groups are a common component of interventions in schizophrenia. Aims: To explore patients' views about wanted and unwanted effects of group psychoeducation. Method: Subjective feedback of 103 participants of a psychoeducational intervention as well as data from two specific focus groups—one with "enthusiastic" and one with "critical" participants—were analyzed by means of qualitative content analysis. Results: Participants emphasized the importance of information received and of exchanging information with others suffering from the same disorder. Positive effects on coping, activation and social interaction were reported. Perceived overemphasis on illness related information produced defensive reactions, whereas the integration of quality of life topics was appreciated. A pleasant group atmosphere and clinical stability were suggested as important determinants of success. Conclusions: Qualitative analyses of participants' views help to understand the potentials of a psychoeducational intervention in schizophrenia.

Introduction

In the CATIE study, a naturalistic randomized-controlled trial comparing five antipsychotic compounds, 74% of all patients discontinued their original antipsychotic medication before the end of the 18 months of the first phase of the trial [17]. While the possibility to switch to a different compound might have influenced the decision to discontinue, one wonders what the discontinuation rate would have looked like, if additional psychosocial treatment strategies had been used. Similarly, a recent study which compared the effects of first and second-generation antipsychotics on quality of life outcome in schizophrenia showed only modest (and non-different) improvements for both groups over an year [11]. Here, the same question of the possible benefit of additional psychosocial measures arises, not the least because it has been shown that a marked difference between first and second generation antipsychotics is that the latter increase the participation rate in additionally offered psychosocial measures [3,4].

It is established that psychosocial measures not only enhance compliance, but also augment symptomatic and functional recovery in schizophrenia [26, 40]. More specifically, psychoeducational interventions have shown consistent effects independent of their design [25]. However, in contrast to pharmacotherapy and similar to other community-based psychological interventions [7, 24, 33], little is known about the active ingredients and possible mechanisms of action of psychoeducational interventions. Qualitative studies are more suited than randomized controlled trials to answer such questions [22].

The aim of the present study was to evaluate participants' perception of a psychoeducational intervention, in order to identify aspects of the intervention possibly responsible for wanted and unwanted subjectively experienced effects. The psychoeducational
