 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

Learners study criminal justice courses for many reasons. The psychological study of the law enables students to diversify their career objectives. An understanding of psychology can enable a person to find a job opportunity in the criminal justice system (Greene, Heibrun, & Fortune, 2011). Psychology affects both authorities and offenders. The purpose of this article is to outline the function of a psychologist in the criminal justice system. The structure may be made up of applied scientists, basic scientists, policy evaluators, and advocates. Through this, comprehensive illustrations of each of these roles are illustrated within law enforcement, correction, and a court system.

Law enforcement setting

The law enforcement section consists of both the applied and basic scientist. Applied scientists comprise of workers with an associate degree specializing in law enforcement, corrections, or courts. Basic scientists are employees who have undergone basic training after high school completion. In this section, psychologists act as organizational development advisors, performance results evaluation counselors, and behavioral psychologists. For example, psychologists provide consultation, psychological services, and pieces of advice to applied scientists (Althouse, 2010). They also offer stress management services and the provision of a psychological perspective of investigations to basic scientists. Other psychologists are employed in law enforcement organizations to provide psychosomatic guidelines and services.

Correction set up

The psychologist can engage in many varied responsibilities in correction systems. Examining and caring for the convicts with mental disorders and formulating evaluations for diverse departments of the judicial system are some of the roles. Penitentiary psychologists are called upon to arbitrate when calamity arises (Greene et al., 2011).
