

Radical, Relevant, Reflective and Brilliant: Towards the Future of Business Ethics

Laura J. Spence¹

In this essay, I reflect on the world in which the Journal of Business Ethics has flourished at the occasion of its 40th anniversary. I take inspiration from five essays in this special anniversary issue, covering broad themes of the centrality of business ethics to global and local challenges, a fresh look at the age-old conundrum of whether business is antithetical to ethics, the highly prescient issue of new technologies, a vigorous set of arguments for new empirical approaches in business ethics and some convincing reflections on the important role of the academic subject of business ethics in wider perspective. I couple the ideas from the essays with my own perceptions and learning, having had the good fortune to be part of the field since the 1990s. From the starting point of the past 40 years, I look to the future and identify the need for business ethics to be radical, relevant, reflective and brilliant. I believe that we are up to the task, if we continue to be open to new approaches and perspectives, enthusiastically and meaningfully embracing the diversity of our field to elevate the contribution we offer.

I should declare a huge fondness and appreciation as well as long-term role as a critical friend of the Journal of Business Ethics. Like so many colleagues, JBE has been closely entwined with my career thus far. I published my first ever journal article in JBE in the late 1990s (Spence, 1998), have been on four guest editorial teams for special issues published herein, was the founding section editor for Small Business and Social Entrepreneurship in 2004 and have been consulting editor working in support of the section editors and editors-in-chief since 2017.

Turning Back the Clock?

Taking the opportunity to look back to the world into which the Journal of Business Ethics (JBE) boldly stepped in 1982, it quickly becomes clear that in the 2020s, though the details are different, we are far from living in the unprecedented times which we are prone to claim. The world faced global health disasters then and now, with AIDS and COVID-19. Over the years there have been massive technological shifts, via the birth of personal computing and mobile telephony (1982 was pre-internet days), to the explosion of powerful artificial intelligence, everyday virtual working, and the internet of things. We have witnessed the complete restructuring of industries and their business models, for instance the launch of MTV and CDs in the 1980s to the overwhelming dominance of streaming and self-managed musicians launching their own careers via social media and the attention economy in the current decade. The delivery of news shifted in the 1980s, with global news service CNN just beginning, and the world in the 2020s rapidly adjusting to personalised current affairs coming from the devices of individuals anywhere in the world to each of us directly. In global politics, many countries were—and still are—reconfiguring themselves after independence from their colonial rulers. The (European) cold war and South African apartheid were starting to show cracks, though none of these dark phases of history can be considered over. Peace has tragically been an elusive condition at least somewhere in the world, then, now, and at all times in between. While there have been some improvements overall, poverty, injustice, displacement of people, misogyny, racism, inequality, and climate change were the subjects of protest in the 80s just as they are forty years on.
