RESEARCH AS AN AID TO MARKETING FOREST PRODUCTS

by

C.D. Howick*

1. BACKGROUND

If marketing is the identification of a need and the setting out of those things that are necessary to satisfy that need - at a profit, then research and marketing should be interdependent.

Early research was necessary before the diversity of species making up the Australian forest resource could be presented in the marketplace to customers more familiar with products from the forests of the Northern hemisphere. In the 1930's, research in the Division of Forest Products was therefore largely mission oriented towards resource development, with a strong Utilisation Section interfacing with industry and an active collecting of information on the properties and best uses of Australian woods (Hillis 1984). Research in the areas of paper science, preservative treatment, sawing and drying practices, sawn product specifications and in veneer and plywood manufacture, dramatically improved the utility value of many indigenous forest species. This work greatly assisted Australian forest industries in becoming established during the harsh years of the 1930's and enabled them to make a significant contribution to the war effort and to participate in the post-war boom years. Over recent years however, the technological advantage once enjoyed by the Australian timber industry has been lost. Rising costs, a dramatically changing resource base and competition from cheaper imports accompanied by a market with a declining growth rate, are all factors which have contributed to a high level of uncertainty within the industry. This has led to a lack of confidence in reinvestment for innovation and new products within the industry.
