intersection of Broadway and Times Square in New York City and the topic for Forty Second Street the movie which told of its theaters in Linden Hills Forty Second Street she knew had not much to do about anything no hoopla no recognition but led her to enchantments of many possibilities Well maybe the idea of escape to the lake with trees and flowers birds little ground animals and baby fish swimming at the shoreline fantasy thoughts took over She stopped at a steep decline where the street and the golden sunrise met on Forty Second Street The water and charm of sail boats and painted buildings and more trees and flowers was a place of transformation She became one with nature If she hurried she'd be at the water's edge in a blink Aware that those sensations of exhilaration were not hers alone but stupendous persons existed at Lake Harriet in Linden Hills and they walked and ran by her Walk walking sunbeams burst as crystalline upon the lake all things that required her concentration and focus had been left back there
