Władysław Stanisław Reymont, 1976-01-01 Praised be Jesus Christ World without end What my good Agatha And whither be you wandering now Out into the world please your Reverence into the wide world she answered with a wave of her staff from east to west The priest mechanically turned his eyes in that direction but closed them to the blinding sun in the western sky Then he said in a lower and somewhat hesitating tone Have the Klembas turned you out Or is it only a little bickering between you She drew herself up a little and before answering cast her eyes around her upon the bare autumnal fields and the village roofs surrounded by fruit gardens No they have not turned me out how could they They are good folk and my close kin And as for bickering there was none I myself saw that I had better leave that s all Better to leap into the deep than cumber another man s wagon So I had to go there was no work for me Winter is coming but what of that Are they to give me food and a corner to sleep in while I do nothing to earn it Besides they have just weaned their calf and the goslings must be sheltered under their roof at night for it is getting cold I have to make room Why beasts are God s creatures too But they are kind folk they keep me in summer time at least and do not begrudge me a corner of their house and a morsel of their food And in winter I go out into the wide world asking alms I need but little and that little good people give me With the help of the Lord Jesus I shall pull through till spring and put something by into the bargain Surely the sweet good Jesus will not forsake His poor No that He will not the priest reassured her in earnest tones quietly pressing a small silver coin into her hand Thanks thanks and God bless your Reverence She bowed her shaking head as low as his knees while big tears trickled down her face a face rugged and furrowed like newly ploughed autumn fields The priest felt confused Go and God speed you on your way he faltered raising her up With trembling hands she crossed herself took hold of her wallet and her sharp pointed staff and started off along the broad and deeply rutted road toward the forest turning now and again to glance at the village the fields where potatoes were then being dug and the smoke from many a herdsman s fire wafted low over the stubble The priest who had previously been seated upon a plough wheel now returned to it took a pinch of snuff and opened his breviary but his eyes would stray now and then from the red print and glance over the vast landscape slumbering in autumnal peace or gaze into the pale blue sky or wander to his men leaning over the plough he was guiding Hey Valek That furrow is crooked he cried out sitting up with his eyes following every step of two sturdy grey plough horses Once more he returned to his breviary and his lips again moved but his eyes soon unconsciously wandered to the horses or to a flock of crows cautiously hopping with outstretched beaks in the newly made furrow and taking wing when even the whip cracked or the horses wheeled round after which they would alight heavily in the wake of the plough and sharpen their beaks on the hard sun baked clods just turned up Valek just flick the right hand mare a bit she is lagging behind He smiled to see her draw evenly after this correction and when the horses came to the roadside jumped up to pat their necks a caress to which the animals responded by stretching their noses towards his face and sniffing complacently Het a ah Valek then sang out Pulling the silver bright share out of the furrow he deftly lifted up the plough swung the horses round and thrust the shining steel

into the earth again At a crack of the whip the horses set tugging till the cross bar creaked again and on they went ploughing away at the great strip of land which stretching out at right angles to the road descended the slope and not unlike the woof of some coarse hempen stuff ran down as far as the low lying hamlet nestling amongst the red and yellow leaves of its orchards It was near the end of autumn but the weather was still warm and rather drowsy The sun was still hot enough and hanging in the south west above the woods made the shrubs and the pear trees and even the hard dry clods cast strong cold shadows Ineffable sweetness and serenity reigned in the air full of a golden haze of sunlit dust over the fields lately harvested while above in the azure heaven enormous white clouds floated here and there like great wind tormented snow drifts Below as far as the eye could see lay the drab hued fields forming a sort of huge basin with a dark blue rim of forest a basin across which like a silken skein glittering in the sunshine a river coursed sparkling and winding among the alders and willows on its banks In the midst of the hamlet it spread out into a large oblong body of water and then ran northward through a rift in the hills At the bottom of the valley skirting the lake lay the village with the sunlight playing on the many autumnal hues of its fruit gardens Thence even up to the very edge of the forest ran the long bands of cultivated ground stretches of grey fields with thread like pathways between them whereon pear trees and blackthorns grew the general ashen tint being in places variegated by patches of gold yellow lupines with fragrant flowers or by the dull silver of the dried up bed of some torrent or by quiet sandy roads with rows of tall poplars overshadowing them reaching upwards to the hills and woods The priest was suddenly roused from the contemplation of this scene A long mournful lowing was heard at no great distance making the crows take wing and fly away obliquely to the potato diggings their dark fluttering shadows following them over the partly sown fields Shading his eyes with his hand he gazed in the direction of the sun and the forest and beheld a little girl coming towards him and leading a large red cow by a rope As she approached she said Praised be Jesus Christ and would have gone out of her way to kiss the priest s hand but the cow jerked her away and fell a lowing anew
