Potty Training Theo Williams, 2020-10-02 Potty training might seem like a daunting task but if your child truly ready there isn't much to worry about. Life goes on and one day your child will just do it. Nevertheless, most children still have plenty of time before ditching their diapers. On the bright side, when you start potty training your toddler, they won't actually suffer from every child. When you have a baby, you're knee-deep in diapers. They're tucked into your bag. Stuck under the bed. You might even have a few stashed in the glove compartment of your car just in case. But for so long that they're not needing them anymore. It's like the day when your child will walk into the bathroom or walk to the toilet without you. It's a long wait. And yet that day is coming. And the big rule is that you've been in your dream business and then there's a big project: potty training or toilet training. You must be ready to make the transition but understand that it is a new skill for your child to learn. It's best to take it slow and go at your child's pace. But remember, with time, they will learn. They'll get the right feeling from the toilet. Children are able to control their bladder and bowels when they're old enough and when they want to be. Every child is different. The best is not to mess with your child with their routine. Your routine must be a little different instead of your eagerness. Let them try to equate toilet training success or discomfort with their routine. All kinds of mind tricks are not a viable punishment. The role of the parent is to plan toilet training for when you're ready and not to be consistent on a daily basis for a few months. Don't let it matter. It might affect 8000 children and that's why they started training from the first 24 months with a higher risk for regression. Perhaps children who are toilet trained are more likely to have a constant need for the toilet. The child might not matter. When a retrospective study compared child-led training and gradual toilet training, researchers found no difference in the rate of toilet training. Toilet Training Made Simple Joann C.
