Abstract

The Quranic text today is recited in ten canonical reading traditions with two distinct canonical transmissions each. These reading traditions are distinct in their phonological and morphological details, as well as the interpretation of the ambiguous consonantal text. However, they all have in common that they adhere to the consonantal skeleton of the standard Quran text. Despite this adherence, on rare occasions readers do deviate from this standard text. This paper examines those cases, and explores the reasons why the canonical readers felt licensed to do so. Especially 'Abū 'Amr was prone to deviate from the consonantal text in cases of perceived grammatical issues. Moreover, the readers occasionally deviated from their regional consonantal text when other regional codices had another form. Finally, readers deviated from the consonantal text, in cases where the text came in conflict with the pausal spelling principle.

Keywords

1 Introduction

The ways in which the Quran has been treated in the Islamic tradition is remarkably dynamic. In the early decades of Islam there appear to have been several different (albeit still quite closely related) text types of the Quran. But very quickly—almost certainly during the reign of the third Islamic caliph

Reading 1759 Shaun Regan, 2013 Reading 1759 investigates the literary culture of a remarkable year in British and French history writing and ideas familiar to many as the British year of victories during the Seven Years War. 1759 was also an important year in the histories of fiction, philosophy, ethics and aesthetics. Reading 1759 is the first book to examine together the range of works written and published during this crucial year. Offering broad coverage of the year's work in writing, these essays examine key works by Johnson, Voltaire, Sterne, Adam Smith, Edward Young, Sarah Fielding and Christopher Smart along with such group projects as the Encyclopédie and the literary review journals of the mid-eighteenth century. Organized around a cluster of key topics, the volume reflects the concerns most important to writers themselves in 1759. This was a year of the new and the modern as writers addressed current issues of empire and ethical conduct, forged new forms of creative expression and grappled with the nature of originality itself. Texts written and published in 1759 confronted the history of Western colonialism, the problem of prostitution in a civilized society and the limitations of linguistic expression. Philosophical issues were also important in 1759, not least the thorny question of causation while in France state censorship challenged the Encyclopédie, the central Enlightenment project. Taking into its purview such texts and intellectual developments, Reading 1759 puts the literary culture of this singular and singularly important year on the scholarly map. In the process, the volume also provides a self-reflective contribution to the growing body of annualized studies that focus on the literary output of specific years.
