Science and Christian Tradition Thomas Henry Huxley, 1898 Science and the Christian Tradition , 1945

Science in Theology Neil Messer, 2020-06-25 If we wish to understand ourselves and the world in relation to God what contribution to our understanding should we expect from a Christian tradition with its roots in the Bible and what should we expect from the natural sciences Neil Messer sets out five types of answer to that question The responses range from the view that the Christian tradition has nothing to contribute through various forms of dialogue to the claim that science is irrelevant to theological understanding This classification scheme is illustrated and tested by extended explorations of three topics in the science and theology field how to think about God's action in the world how to make theological sense of the suffering and destruction involved in the evolution of life and how theology should respond to the scientific study of religion The classification offers a way to understand and evaluate these debates and the discussion of specific examples demonstrates the strengths and weaknesses of each type of approach The book concludes with suggestions for how readers might use this scheme to guide their own work on science and theology For students and researchers in science and theology this book offers three things a tool for understanding specific debates in science and theology critical surveys of some of the most important debates in the field and a concise guide to ways of setting up encounters of theology with science hateful things that ought to have nothing to do with one's estimation of the religion which they have perverted and disfigured out of all likeness to the original. The simple fact is that as I have already more than once hinted my story is that of the wolf and the lamb over again. I have never gone out of my way to attack the Bible or anything else; it was the dominant ecclesiasticism of my early days which as I believe without any warrant from the Bible itself thrust the book in my way.
