

Exercise B

*Submit in pdf format to Avenue by Wednesday September 28, 11:00 pm.
(Due one day later this week to account for Rosh Hashanah.)*

Exercise 1

(yes, this question is part of the exercise and counts for completeness)

Look back at the previous exercise and at the feedback on it. How do your answers compare with the feedback?

- If you didn't do the exercise last week, which of the questions looks the hardest to you? What questions do you have about the feedback?
- If you did do the exercise, which questions did you get wrong? Which one was the hardest? Do you understand the feedback?
- If you did the exercise and all your answers match the feedback answers, write a sentence here to indicate that.
- If you still have questions, post them to the discussion board!

Exercise 2

This article from the Canadian Encyclopedia describes some attributes of the variety of English spoken widely in Canada. One claim the author makes is that:

*"Canadians pronounce the -ile suffix in words like fertile, futile, hostile, missile and mobile with a full vowel like that in profile, whereas Americans rhyme futile with brutal, hostile with hostel, missile with thisle, mobile with noble, etc." (Boberg, 2019)*

Make some observations about your own variety of English:

- How do you pronounce the words fertile, futile, hostile, missile, mobile? Does your pronunciation align with the encyclopedia's description of Canadian English, or is yours more similar to the typical American pronunciation? Or is it different from both?
- What other differences in pronunciation and in vocabulary have you noticed between your variety of English and the English used by other folks? For example, do the other students in your dorm or house use different words to you? Do you have some pronunciations that are different from your parents' or grandparents'? Give at least three examples of variation you've noticed.

Exercise 3

For each of the following sentences, make a metalinguistic grammaticality observation. In other words, check in with your mental grammar to decide whether each sentence is grammatical (i.e., possible) in your variety of English.
