Abstract

Universities are vital institutions for nurturing talent, and the cultivation of talent should not only focus on imparting disciplinary knowledge but also emphasize the development of humanistic qualities and ideological morality. This study centers on the labor practice course Computer Equipment Repair and Maintenance, refining the course content and modularizing the teaching process. Each module is structured around four components: theoretical explanation, operational demonstration, operational verification, and experimental summary, ensuring a close integration of theory and practice. This approach enables students to master knowledge while standardizing operations, identifying problems, and solving them. The course not only emphasizes the development of technical skills but also ingeniously integrates ideological and political elements into the teaching process. Through the design of experimental content, the course combines ideological and political themes such as craftsmanship, teamwork, innovation, safety awareness, patriotism, integrity, and academic ethics with operational explanations, thereby fulfilling the fundamental educational mission of fostering virtue and cultivating talent.

1. Introduction

"Computer Equipment Repair and Maintenance" is a practical course for computer-related majors in engineering colleges and universities. It serves as a foundational course for the proper use and maintenance of computer equipment. This course plays a significant role in cultivating students' abilities to install and maintain operating systems, drivers, and various application software, as well as to identify and resolve faults through critical thinking and hands-on practice. Additionally, it helps students develop good habits in using computer equipment. In the classroom, students are required to complete various experimental tasks according to the lab instructions and write lab reports. Their operational process reflects moral integrity such as honesty and trustworthiness, habits of using public equipment, and the professional ethics of computer practitioners. In order to enable students to adopt the spirit of model workers as their value orientation, understand the professional ethics and norms of honesty, fairness, and integrity in engineering, and consciously adhere to them in computer engineering practice, the course content should be structured to balance both the development of technical skills and the guidance of ideological depth.
