Introduction

This chapter deals with one of the most important problems in the radiological diagnosis of gastric cancer, namely, the characteristics of various methods and their practical use. The change of emphasis in the morphogenesis of gastric cancer and in the »favored« location of cancer's appearance in the stomach make it necessary to radically revise the methodological approach to radiological diagnosis of gastric cancer.

The method of X-ray examination of the stomach which was worked out in the first half of the past century is now outdated and requires radical correction. In addition, if we consider the fact that a group of new technologies such as ultrasonography, computed tomography, and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) has appeared, it becomes quite obvious that the outdated method of radiological examination in gastroenterology on the whole, and in gastric cancer in particular, needs to be thoroughly revised. Based on this postulate, we will discuss the methodological aspects of using radiology to diagnose gastric cancer in this chapter.

Traditional X-ray Investigations

With the introduction of contrast media, which help to visualize the alimentary tract without inflicting any damage on the patient, the classical X-ray examination became the leading method for diagnosing gastric cancer. Gastroenterology was qualified as a relatively independent branch in medicine, and by the 1960s–1970s it had accumulated vast experience in the diagnosis of gastric cancer. A group of experienced radiologists emerged who mastered the X-ray examination of the stomach. A roentgenosemiotics of gastric cancer was then compiled; some of the signs remain valid today, but some require re-evaluation.

Unfortunately, the indisputable successes of X-ray methods achieved in gastroenterology led to the erroneous belief that these methods had reached
