

The Russian Army from 1918 to 1941

In 1917 the Tsar's army was replaced by the first revolutionary army, a force which was at best 50 per cent Red Guard. The military experience of the war had been such that the so-called 'warrior' revolutionaries had also created powerful 'warrior' organisations. In the revolutionary period, and it was from these that the Red Guard was created when, on 8 November 1917, the Constituent Congress elected the first People's government and also the 'People's Commissars for the Army' which was required to form a regular Red Army. The Red Guard in full was the 'Workers' and Peasants' Red Army which finally assumed this title in the Third Congress of January 1918. It was based on voluntary enlistment.

Right from the beginning the young army had to withstand a constant attack from several fronts simultaneously: from the 'Whites' who wanted to restore the old regime, from the Allied intervention, and even from various suspicious Communist leaders. Commanded by both the Commissars of the People and some Tsarist officers who had gone over to the new regime, these units had to be very low in order to survive their losses.

However, in spite of the constant' military pressure, and the extensive desertion of the ex-Tsarist officers, from leaders like Tukhachevski and Budennyi, as well as the ex-military officers like Voroshilov and Dzerzhinski, managed to organise things very successfully. The volunteer system had quickly been replaced by conscription, but only peasants and workers had the honour of defending their country under arms. A generalised levy was created, conscription for the White troops for the Cossacks which were becoming numerous, as the war was 'People vs. Bourgeoisie' the first Red conscription to be imposed against the Whites. Then 1920 saw the rapid demobilisation of the Allied contingents, who were replaced with collecting and firing for a cause about which they finally agreed. Nevertheless it took another two years before the country was finally rid of the last remnants of the White army in Eastern Siberia and the Ukraine, and even in the government in Moscow.

THE ARMY AND THE MILITIA

It was become necessary to organise the demobilisation of an army which by January 1920 had grown from a hundred thousand men in 1918 to four million. The army was completely reorganised, and in 1924 reduced to a permanent force of 500,000 men, fighting five per cent of the militia in the regular army had taken an active part in the battles of the Civil War, and 90 per cent of these belonged to the Communist Party.

Prepared for the regular army were the volunteer militia, in which all citizens were enlisted, this is the total period of military training which was completed at their place of work, from the age of twenty-one young Soviet men were sent off to a military training camp for three to five months training periods which were repeated over the consecutive years. Throughout these periods of training the militiamen received two-thirds of his civilian salary, his job was guaranteed, and he received full normal insurance benefits. Up to the age of twenty-four the militiaman was part of the first call-up, at which age he passed into the second call-up group and he was hence, Citizens considered conscript in their army, that is those who were no workers or peasants or employees in one of the war industries, but in order to train work forces, but only in case of war. Hence, however, their 'script'
