Item response theory (IRT) methodology is introduced as a tool for improving assessment instruments used with people who have disabilities. Need for this approach in rehabilitation is emphasized; differences between IRT and classical test theory are clarified. Concepts essential to understanding IRT are defined, necessary data assumptions are identified, and specific data analysis techniques, using software such as TESTFACT and BILCOG, are described. An example of IRT analysis applied to a subset of the General Aptitude Test Battery (GATB) administered to people who have diverse disabilities is provided. Future potential uses of this approach in rehabilitation are outlined.

The purpose of this article is to introduce item response theory (IRT) and the associated latent trait and item response modeling techniques in an effort to improve psychometric methodology focused on the assessment of people who have disabilities. The need for such methodology in rehabilitation applications is emphasized, and examples of applications in related areas are provided. Differences between IRT and "classical" test theory are clarified, and implications of those differences are discussed. Key constructs necessary to understand IRT methodology are defined. Statistical software packages necessary for IRT analyses are described, and resources for developing expertise in using them effectively are identified. A practical example of IRT analysis of one of the subsets of the General Aptitude Test Battery (GATB; U.S. Department of Labor, 1970) administered to a rehabilitation client population is given, accompanied by explanations about how to select the appropriate analysis options and how to interpret the resulting statistical output for each phase of the analysis. Implications of the findings from this example application are then discussed.

IMPORTANCE OF IRT

IRT techniques have tremendous potential for solving measurement problems in rehabilitation. A test developer using IRT generates a mathematical function to describe the relationship between test performance and ability or trait level. This function can be used to estimate a wide range of ability levels, such as those common among samples of rehabilitation clients, regardless of the range of ability within the original normative sample (Hambleton & Swaminathan, 1985). Because this methodology focuses on the relationship between each individual item and the underlying (latent) trait or ability assessed by the instrument, each of those items can provide meaningful information about an examinee. In contrast, traditional testing requires administration of the entire test to each examinee to meaningfully interpret the test results. If a test has been developed using IRT, the level of the ability or trait measured can be estimated for an individual completing any subset of the test items; administration of the entire test is no longer necessary. Different subsets of items can be given to different examinees or to the same examinees at different points in time; interpretation of the results does not depend on consistent administration of one standardized set of items. Estimates of an examinee's individual ability or trait levels are generated through formulas computing the levels along that latent continuum with the greatest probability, given that individual's pattern of responses to the particular subset of items administered. In contrast, for assessment instruments developed without IRT techniques, meaningful in-
