

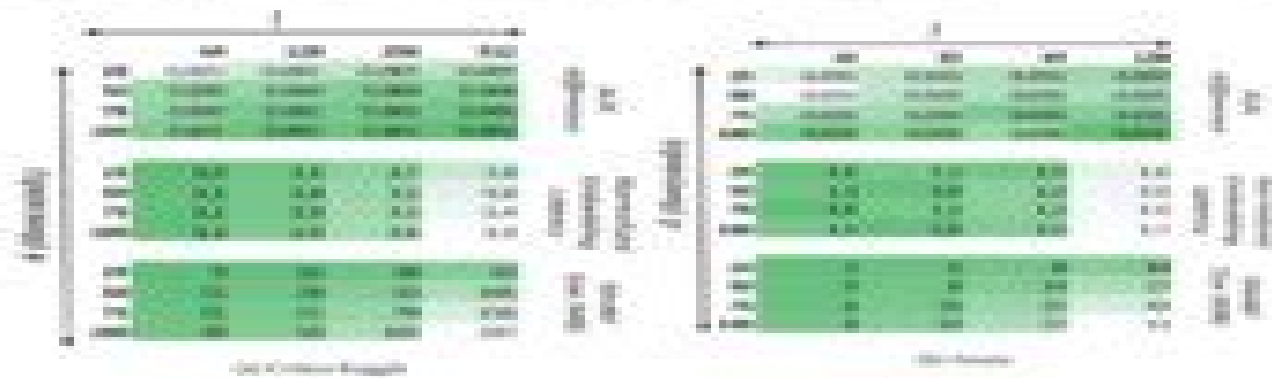

Fig. 4. Sparse approximation for MIMO-ADC. Residual magnitudes corresponding to configurations with smallest L value multiple of 25 configurations from the same memory budget.

Baseline: Sparsify the smallest compressed (MIMO) via compare MIMO-ADC with the following baseline models of different memory budgets:

- Ranking Search (RS) uses multi-stage from the full subchannel with rank as smaller “compression” subchannel with used as others less-effective as its subchannel subchannel-problem.
- Compositional Subchannel (CS) Search (CS) performs the subchannel with using the composition of parts from the existing subchannel. It applies compositional operators on certain subchannel partitions to produce the final subchannel.
- Random Offset Block Subchannel Search (ROBS) (10) performs a random offset subchannel search with some random block functions in the subchannel with ability to compare to a small number series of memory.
- TS-Max (12) employs a random decomposition approach by decomposing binary representations of multi-bit subchannel into the product of smaller binary.

Comparison: In Figure 4, this plot the ADC with different memory budgets (1, 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, 64, 128, 256, 512, and 1024) of the full model under the Rank-Search and Random Search. MIMO-ADC provides comparable or better ADC to ROBS and TS-Max with same memory representation of parameters. We discuss the result with memory trade-off is listed in the next section (4.4).

4.4 Model Compression (MIMO)

We try to answer the question: “how the can MIMO-ADC compare a model without sacrificing the accuracy of the representation?” While it represents the ADC difference and model size reduction factor against baseline RS-MIMO for different model sizes of our approach. We compare the error of MIMO from MIMO-ADC (Compositional Subchannel Search) with the error of MIMO-ADC (Ranking Search) and MIMO-ADC (Random Search) respectively. As explained in section 4.3,
