Heart Failure: A Major Management Challenge With Encouraging Recent Progress

Heart failure is a major health problem, affecting an estimated 38 million persons worldwide, accounting for more than a million hospital admissions per year in the United States and Europe, and carrying a prognosis worse than many cancers.¹ Although it has been commonly assumed that most patients with cardiac failure have reduced left ventricular function (referred to as heart failure with reduced ejection fraction [HFrEF]), there is increasing evidence that many patients can have symptoms and signs of cardiac failure with normal left ventricular function (heart failure with preserved ejection fraction [HFpEF]).² With increasing understanding of the important role of the adverse effect of neurohumoral factors in heart failure, the focus of pharmacologic attention has moved away from the seemingly logical task of stimulating the heart with inotropic agents³ to blocking the neurohumoral mediators of the syndrome. Although recent development of innovative approaches to inotropic therapy with inodilation with calcium-sensitizing therapy in with levosimendan⁴ and omecantiv mecarbil⁵ may yet have the potential to improve systolic performance without increasing the heart's demand for energy, advances in other areas of drug, device, and transplant currently occupy prominence in heart failure management. This Special Issue reviews these exciting recent advances in the treatment of heart failure.

BEYOND ANGIOTENSIN-CONVERTING ENZYME INHIBITORS AND ANGIOTENSIN RECEPTOR BLOCKERS

The role of the renin-angiotensin-aldosterone system (RAAS) inhibitors is also widely accepted, with an extensive evidence base justifying cornerstone status in the treatment of HFrEF.⁶ In the most recent meta-analysis of 54,621 patients with heart failure in randomized clinical trials, RAAS inhibition reduced the risks of hospitalization for heart failure by 20%, cardiovascular mortality by 14%, and all-cause mortality by 11%. The effect was less definite in patients whose ejection fractions were not markedly depressed or normal.⁷ Whether angiotensin receptor blockers (ARBs) should be favored over angiotensin-converting enzyme inhibitors (ACEIs) in the treatment of heart failure because of their better side effects profile remains unclear.

The most recent Cochrane review⁸ on this topic concluded that ARBs do not reduce total mortality or morbidity compared with ACEIs, and recent guidelines recommend that the primary choice of RAAS inhibitor in heart failure remains an ACEI, limiting the use of ARBs to patients who are intolerant of ACEIs.⁹⁻¹⁰
