Robert Stone, Poetry Center of the 92nd Street YM-YWHA (New York,

N.Y.), Book-of-the-Month Club, Houghton, Mifflin and Company, Robert Stone Robert Solotaroff, 1994 In the twenty five years between the publication of Robert Stone's first novel A Hall of Mirrors 1967 and the critical response to his fifth Outerbridge Reach 1992 he has incised a striking imprint on the terrain of contemporary American fiction One of our best contemporary critics William Pritchard has written that Stone's novels are literally impossible to put down Here perhaps are several of the causes of Stone's hold on the attentive reader the precision and variety of his narrative voices as they range from the genuinely lyrical to accents that perfectly capture the inner life of his more desperate violent characters his uncanny ear for the spoken idioms of all sorts of people the scope and trenchancy of his critique of the contemporary American experience particularly experience pushed to its extremities But if Stone believes that life is at bottom war his aesthetic control of his conflicts lifts the agonies he describes into something transfigured by the imagination that gave birth to them Robert Solotaroff's study begins with a remarkable first chapter in which he follows Stone from birth to the publication of his first novel Solotaroff's insight as he recounts Stone's evolution from an abused child raised by a schizophrenic mother to a West Side gang member who was thrown out of high school through a hitch in the Navy that included combat and finally into a respected author allows more than a mere glimpse into the worlds of Robert Stone's novels In the subsequent chapters Solotaroff examines each of the novels his research informed not only by exhaustive readings but also by interviews with the author Having carefully spanned the events that fire and support Stone's fiction Solotaroff attends to the style and content with equal conviction and vigilance Finally he devotes an entire chapter to Stone's stories and nonfiction substantial and penetrating bodies of work in their own right
