Putting On Appearances Diane Barthel, 2010-03-29 A lively critical analysis that reveals the overlooked and underestimated depth of cultural meaning behind contemporary American advertising

Putting On Appearances Diane Barthel, 1988 In this lively critical analysis Diane Barthel reveals the previously overlooked and underestimated depth of cultural meaning behind contemporary American advertising Focusing mainly on ads for beauty products directed at women she demonstrates how stereotypical gender identities are emphasized and how advertising itself creates a gendered relationship with the consumer She explores psychological sociological and cultural messages in advertising to show how Putting on Appearances is anything but a purely personal matter and how the social realities in which we are forced to live are conditioned by the personal appearances we choose to create Most advertisements are not sexually obvious but rely instead on sexual story telling in which seduction deception and passion are portrayed as acceptable means for achieving selfhood Advertisements that proclaim Now is the time to paint your knees speak with one form of authority those that present the voice of the all knowing scientist or the nurturing mother rely on others Celebrities figure as professional beauties and wise older sisters sharing their secrets with the consumer The Gentle Treatment Great Model Search Made Me a Star Now it's your turn Inseparable from the clothes we wear and the products we use are our ideas and fantasies about our bodies Beauty products present beauty rituals as transcendent occasions and diet products call up religious imagery of guilt and salvation The body itself is to be anxiously manipulated and systematically worked over until the consumer turns her body into an advertisement for herself a complicated sign to be read and admired In the series Women in the Political Economy edited by Ronnie J Steinberg

Manipulating Images Tawnya J. Adkins Covert, 2011-03-03 Manipulating Images World War II Mobilization of Women through Magazine Advertising explores gendered and class based representations of American women in women's magazine advertisements published during the period surrounding the Second World War Focusing on the interrelationships among political economic and social forces in the construction of prevailing cultural images and gender roles for women in society the book examines both the process of creating and the resulting content of wartime mobilization messages found in magazine advertising aimed at American women The unique circumstances of the Second World War provide a window where the continuous but normally implicit interactions among the social forces which construct class differentiated gendered expectations for women in society are revealed recorded and made accessible for study During this period the federal government altered the prevailing media representations of women and women's roles in response to widespread labor shortages stemming from the movement of male workers into the armed forces and increased demand for military and consumer goods The advertising industry business leaders and media representatives cooperated with the federal government in the creation of labor mobilization and other wartime campaigns Two types of data are examined to assess the changing nature of the relationships among government business and media and the resulting media images and messages regarding women's roles First the study explores archived government documents that illuminate the relationships among government business and media as they responded to the needs and conditions of war Second this book examines advertisements published in women's magazines before during and following the Second World War ICGR
