Searching for Sarah in the Second Temple Era Joseph McDonald, 2020-02-20 Seeking to build upon recent scholarship based on Biblical women Joseph McDonald uses a character centered literary approach to read the story of Sarah as it was told and retold in the Second Temple period McDonald offers an alternative to the usual approaches to rewritten Bible narratives which often emphasize near context synoptic comparison of retold stories and their scriptural precursors arguing that examination of retold narratives as narratives reveals important aspects of their internal literary effects that may otherwise go unnoticed Taken together McDonald suggests that such readings reveal one of Sarah's trans narrative or deep traits as a curious multi faceted resemblance to the character of Abraham The richness of her images however shows that this resemblance is not the ultimate distillation of Sarah but a symptom of the kind of restriction that she consistently faces in this literature McDonald concludes that creative readings of the narratives featuring Sarah in the Hebrew Bible the Septuagint the Genesis Apocryphon and the Jewish Antiquities of Josephus illuminate Sarah as a complex and sometimes contradictory figure whose individuality and agency often struggle to escape limitations placed upon her both by other characters such as Abraham and God and by the narrators of her tales

VANNELLI,2012-08-02 Shattered families and bleak everyday interiors at the heart of a hyper realistic urban scenario There are people who make up names and stories for themselves Men who leave fathers who leave women who leave women who stay and get in the way People who are about to say I love you or the opposite and who incessantly ask themselves what in the world it means Today s love and that of tomorrow The I don t knows One two escapes abroad And ultimately a greeting A promise A docking So that the search for oneself calms down for a moment only to start up once more working itself up again in a feverish stile like the frenetic lives that the author narrates without haste The Big One Bruce Gallaher,2013 When a
