Telecomputing in Radiology

Alan H. Rowberg,¹ John D. Newell,² and Tim B. Hunter²

Communication over telephone lines with access through computers—telecomputing—is rapidly expanding. In radiology telecomputing can serve several functions: electronic mail, data-base entry and retrieval, and teleconferencing. The ready availability of powerful personal computers coupled with telecommunications hardware and software now allows the practicing radiologist contact with individuals at distant sites and access to national data bases and networks. All that is needed is a personal computer and compatible telephone modem. The user simply “dials” into any network he or she desires, provided the network is open to the general public or the user is recognized as a legitimate (paying) member of the network. The cost is the phone call (if not an 800 number) or the network charges ($6–$100/hr depending on the network and the user’s tasks). This article briefly considers some of the many benefits of telecomputing and identifies several of the more versatile and popular national networks and databases.

Electronic Mail

Electronic mail can be defined as electronic text communication over short or long distances without any physical written materials exchanged between the individuals. This is accomplished by entering messages into a computer terminal or computer workstation, and electronically transmitting them to another terminal or workstation using telephone lines microwave transmissions, or satellite transmissions.

Electronic mail can be used within a department, within a city, or on a national scale. We are all familiar with the aggravation and loss of efficiency that accompanies unsuccessful telephone contact. This occurs almost daily in all departments. Electronic mail offers an attractive alternative to the game of telephone “tag.” Each staff member within a department can be assigned an electronic “mailbox” where telephone messages are received and recorded. The staff member can then use his or her computer terminal to periodically check on the “mail” that has arrived. To send a message to members within the department or to physicians linked to the electronic mail system outside the department, a message is typed into the computer and is sent to the receiver’s electronic mailbox. A request for a reply to the message can be included. Depending on the responsiveness of the participants, electronic mail can be rapid and efficient.

Communicating with electronic mail is even more powerful when it is used in conjunction with a nationwide computer network. There are many large computer networks that offer electronic mail capability (table 1), and the delay in the delivery of the message ranges from 0 to about 20 min. This article was written at two sites by electronic mail using the CompuServe Information Service electronic mail facility (see Appendix) of CompuServe, a large popular commercial national computer network. Computer networks are used in medicine on a regular basis. The American Association for Medical Systems and Informatics (AAMSI) sponsors a Special Interest Group (SIG) on the CompuServe Information Service with activities in a variety of areas including radiology. The Center for Devices and Radiological Health of the Food and Drug Administration has provided electronic mail services to a group of four medical institutions involved in writing functional requirements for a digital imaging network for radiology departments.
