and striving which with dominating power surround the individual 4 and point out his course With such ascendancy they may seem to him to be unassailable and a matter of natural necessity in reality they are a product of the industry of universal history and from this point of view appear merely as attempts to comprehend the boundless stream of life and to win a character for our otherwise indefinite existence For at first we stand defenceless and helpless in face of the wealth of impressions and suggestions which throng upon us and draw us in opposite directions Only in one way are we able to prevail life must concentrate and acquire a controlling centre within itself and from that begin a process of counteraction We lack distinction of centre and environment we need an inner aspiration an aspiration which seeks to draw the whole of existence to itself and to mould it in its own particular way This however is impossible unless at the same time a philosophy of life a profession of faith as to the nature of the whole a justification of our undertaking is evolved A philosophy of life established in this manner will be incomparably more powerful and fuller in content than the mere foam on the surface of time Rudolf Eucken; a Philosophy of Life Abel J.
