

PERSON-CENTRED APPROACH AND COGNITIVE BEHAVIORAL THERAPY

Updated: Nov 3rd, 2022

BEHAVIOR MANAGEMENT

INTRODUCTION AND AIMS

Psychological treatment is a multidimensional phenomenon that enshrines the incorporation of dynamic initiatives. The main essence of therapy is the coherence of environmental and social frameworks that advance the interdependence and functionalism of the human body. Promoting health encompasses addressing inherent perspectives on harmonizing the distinct variables advocating interaction between environment and well-being. While the person-centered approach encapsulates focusing on an individual's salubrious mainframe, cognitive-behavioral entails the intersection of rehabilitative essence on deteriorative habits among distinct entities, such as addictions (Roué et al., 2017). Integrating variables of PCA and CBT fosters the development of an avenue that appreciates diversity, humanism, and the metaparadigm of nursing. Other ideological overviews that improve interdependence involve the social learning theorem. The main aim of this study engulfs comparing cognitive-behavioral and person-centered advances as remedies to mental illness. There is a significant interdependent relationship between PCA and CBT as practice constructs that promote change in conduct.

PCA AND CBT COMPARE, CONTRAST, AND SIMILARITIES

Cognitive-behavioral therapy is an approach that enshrines the incorporation of treatment perspectives regarding certain illnesses. An excellent example of conditions that pose the necessity of utilizing CBT encompasses marital issues, depression, alcoholism, mental sickness, and anxiety disorders. Research establishes that there are distinct principles enhancing the effectiveness of CBT. One of the codes is the faulty thinking approaches, while a different entity is the negative effect of unhelpful habits, and finally, the necessity of psychologically sick persons to adopt rehabilitative frameworks to improve their living
