
Monstrous Races in the Medieval English Psalter World Map

Marta Przygodzka

This article examines medieval Monstrous Races in the Psalter World Map from the thirteenth-century English Map Psalter (British Library, Add. MS 28681). It suggests the map's reading as a pictorial expression of liminality situated in a to- and fro-ing between conceptions of Us/the Self and Them/the Other. I consider how the map exiles the Monstrous Races through spatially articulated geographical distance; inserts Them into notions of Us via inclusion in God's salvation plan; and gestures towards a category crisis in the Us-Them divide by celebrating England's own peripheral placement on the mappa mundi's border. The border-space which constitutes the nexus of my investigation extends to encompass the Psalter World Map's materiality and the self-definition by means of difference enacted by the reader-viewer in corporeal terms.

*The Monster always escapes because it refuses easy categorisation.*¹

The medieval Monstrous Races are, in Debra Strickland's words, 'imaginary groups of elusive, malformed, and misbehaving creatures located at the edges of the known world, vaguely defined as India, Ethiopia, and the Far North.'² These monsters embody the liminal. They occupy a geographically understood border-space.³ They are oftentimes hybrid, incorporating animal and human parts into the very grammar of their monstrosity.⁴
