Abstract

IMPORTANCE Strategies to activate and engage patients and caregivers in shared decision-making in the acute-care setting may result in improved outcomes.

OBJECTIVE To determine whether a patient activation tool (PAT) can improve decision-making and patient-centered outcomes among pediatric patients and their caregivers who choose between surgery and nonoperative management for their child's appendicitis.

DESIGN, SETTING, AND PARTICIPANTS This single-blind, randomized clinical trial collected data from a single tertiary children's hospital from March 1, 2014, through April 30, 2016, with 1-year follow-up completed on May 1, 2017. Two hundred of 236 eligible children and adolescents aged 7 to 17 years with uncomplicated appendicitis enrolled with their caregivers. After receiving the randomized clinical intervention, caregivers chose surgery or nonoperative management. Data were analyzed from March 1, 2014, through May 1, 2017.

INTERVENTIONS Randomization to a scripted standardized surgical consultation that emphasized patient choice or a scripted standardized surgical consultation plus the PAT (a tablet-based tool that presents each treatment, encourages participation in medical decision making, and aims at alleviating decisional uncertainty).

MAIN OUTCOMES AND MEASURES Decisional self-efficacy immediately after treatment decision, health care satisfaction at discharge, and disability days for the child at 1-year follow-up.

RESULTS Among 200 participants (median age, 12 years [interquartile range (IQR), 9-15 years]; 120 [60.0%] male), 98 were randomized to the PAT and 102 to the standardized consultation groups. The percentages choosing nonoperative management were similar (standardized consultation group, 42 of 102 [41.2%]; PAT group, 31 of 98 [31.6%]; $P = .39$). Immediate decisional self-efficacy was similar in the standardized consultation and PAT groups (median score, 100 [IQR, 97.7-100] vs 100 [IQR, 95.5-100]; $P = .03$), which was not significant at the planned significance level of $P = .02$. Total scores on health care satisfaction at discharge were similar (median, 99 [IQR, 94.7-100] vs 98 [IQR, 94.7-100]; $P = .27$). Disability days at 1-year follow-up were also similar (median, 6 [IQR, 2-31] vs 5 [IQR, 2-15]; $P = .67$). No difference in the failure rate of nonoperative management at 1 year (13 of 38 [34.2%] vs 11 of 30 [36.7%]; $P = .99$) or in the rate of complicated appendicitis 30 days after discharge (7 of 68 [10.3%] vs 9 of 71 [12.7%]; $P = .79$) occurred.

Key Points

Question Can a patient activation tool improve decision-making and patient-centered outcomes in pediatric patients and their caregivers choosing between surgery and nonoperative management for pediatric appendicitis?

Findings In this randomized-clinical trial that included 200 patient-caregiver dyads, groups randomized to the standardized surgical consultation and the patient activation tool had similarly high scores on immediate decisional self-efficacy and health care satisfaction measures at discharge and no differences in disability days or the failure rate of nonoperative management at 1 year.

Meaning Although a patient activation tool did not improve measures of decision making, pediatric patients and families can effectively participate in an informed shared decision-making process in the acute-care setting.
