Abstract. – The site Kremenac has been known for decades as a location where large quantity of raw material for production of the chipped stone artifacts had been found. Only the excavations in 1995 and 1996 defined to a certain extent the artifacts, which indicated by their morphology the Lower Paleolithic date of this site. Because of the impossibility to study for the time being the material from the excavations this work deals with the surface chance finds, which are typologically and even more morphologically distinctive and on the basis of which it is possible to indicate the exceptional early date and importance of this site.

Key words. – Chipped stone artifacts, Lower Paleolithic, Middle Paleolithic, raw materials, flint, opal, quartzite, Rujnik, Niš, Serbia.

The Institute of Archaeology in Belgrade and National Museum in Niš initiated in 1989 the joint project directed by Z. Kaluderović and N. Đurić-Slavković in order to investigate in detail possible Paleolithic sites in the Niš region. The text by A. Oršić-Slavetić, who was the first to indicate the location Kremenac near the village Rujnik in the journal Starinar in 1936 has been used as the starting point.<sup>1</sup> At that time the attention of the academic public was drawn by just one sentence and the summary map to the site where finished and semi-finished flint flakes and huge quantity of unworked pebbles have been found on the surface. The first activity within this project was the site surveying in the immediate vicinity of Kremenac in 1991 and the test trench excavations had been conducted at the foot of Velika Humska Čuka in 1994 when also the prospection of the site Kremenac had been carried out.

The site Kremenac is relatively bare slope about 1.6 km long and around 200 to 270 meters wide covered in places with sparse grass and low bushes and characterized by exceptionally large quantity of flint nodules of various dimensions protruding to the surface (Figs. 1, 2, 3). The northern sections of this slope are at around 390 meters above sea level, while its southern section descending towards the Niš valley is at around 330 meters above sea level. Writing about the genesis and evolution of the Niš valley Martinović states that the Hum–Rujnik extension is apparent to the north of the Nisava River, between the villages Rujnik and Hum exists.<sup>2</sup> The site Kremenac is located at the western
