The Progress Test of the European Hematology Association: A New Tool for Continuous Learning

Mariëlle J. Wondergem¹, Antonio Almeida², Janaki Brodin³, Carlos Fernandez de Larrea⁴, Nathalie van Havre⁵, Bas T. Hemker⁶, Wietske Hollegien⁷, José-Tomás Navarro⁸, Mahesh Prahladan⁹, Alicia Rovó⁹, Gunnar Birgegård¹⁰

Correspondence: Mariëlle J. Wondergem (m.wondergem@amsterdamumc.nl).

The European Hematology Curriculum, first launched in 2006, was created by the European Hematology Association (EHA) with the aim of harmonizing hematology training in Europe. Its goals were to define the different areas hematologists are expected to cover during their training, and to establish the minimum recommended levels of competence that a hematology trainee should attain.¹ The logical next step was the creation of the European Hematology Exams in 2015,² in the wake of several European medical associations that use similar examinations as part of their end of training certification. Since then, the number of candidates and countries participating has increased. Switzerland has included the examination as part of its final assessment toward specialization as a hematologist. During the COVID pandemic, participation in the examination continued unabated, reflecting its importance for hematologists across Europe and beyond.

EHA's education platform (EHA Campus) offers opportunities for continuous learning for both trainees and specialists. Content is guided by the European Hematology Curriculum, which provides a structure for individual study and self-assessment. To complete this organized learning environment, a tool for objective assessment of knowledge during and after specialist training was needed. In the spring of 2020, EHA started offering a progress test: a longitudinal test based on equivalent evaluations given at fixed intervals, assessing developments in knowledge. The EHA Progress Test was inspired by an earlier version developed by the Swedish Hematology Association in 2013, which has become widely used by specialist trainees and specialists in Sweden. Noticeable pedagogical effects, like targeted study efforts in weak knowledge areas, changes in clinical rotations, and more have been reported in personal questionnaires. However, due to the limited number of Swedish trainees, data have not been published.

In undergraduate settings, progress testing has been used for a long time, first introduced at the University of Maastricht ("The Maastricht progress test") in 1977.³ It is now widely used in many undergraduate programs all over the world. Students are given a test containing an extensive set of multiple-choice questions (MCQs) once or twice a year, serving both as an educational tool and as formal examinations of knowledge.⁴ The information gathered can also be used for (re)development of the curriculum and, in the case of collaboration between medical schools, comparison of results between institutions.⁵ In specialist training, progress tests have rarely been implemented. Instead, the focus has been on learning through clinical experience, which means that longitudinal knowledge testing has not been explored in most specialties. Trainees are mostly expected to build their knowledge base in a self-directed way by accumulating clinical experience, often with the help of a clinical tutor. There is extensive research on progress testing in undergraduate medical training, and the usefulness of the approach has been well validated. In postgraduate settings, there is a striking paucity of reports on such testing, even though attempts have been made in a few specialties.¹⁻³

EHA developed the Progress Test to serve both trainees and certified hematologists. It should lead to greater comprehension of their level of knowledge in the different sections of the European Hematology Curriculum, so that everyone can work on improving their knowledge in the weaker sections aiming at intrapersonal development.

To assess progress over time, the level of the test needed to be consistent from one session to the next. Hence, we decided to use the previous versions of the European Hematology Exam. The questions of the examination are written by a trained group of question writers and rigorously peer reviewed according to the guidelines formed by the Examination and Progress Test Working Group. The choice for MCQs allows for a large sample size. Even with limited testing time, it can assess knowledge in several areas with high reproducibility and can be used in a web-based format.^{6,11} The examination questions represent all 8 sections of the
