Introduction

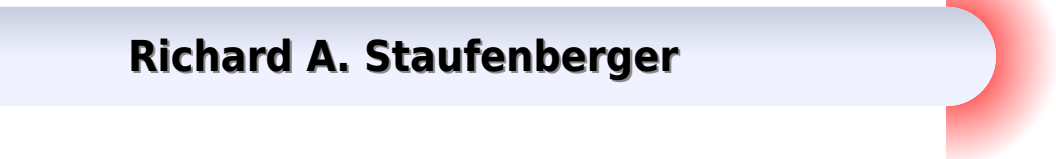

Before 1829, enforcement of law among citizens was done by police constables who volunteered with the assistance of watchmen. This was before the metropolitan police act was passed in 1829. (Martin, 1969 p. 23) argued, "It was only during serious circumstances such as public disorder when the British armed forces came for assistance as they were more organized to handle such situations". Before the passing of the police action, the policing system used to be generally disorganized, and investigation the criminal cases used to be inefficient. In 1748, a novelist by the name Henry Fielding was appointed to be a magistrate and he introduced a detective force under the name Bow-street, runners which was initially a courtroom back in 1739. The detective force comprised of eight constables who received empowerment to enforce the magistrate's decisions, in addition to the assistance from volunteer constables as well as watchmen. They all joined efforts to implement the decision on the investigation of crime in support of the magistrate. Foot and horse patrol was established in 1805 to act as the first form of policing without uniforms and later in 1829 came to be the metropolitan police. Members of the public were privately paid so as to catch thieves and another and later forwarding them to the magistrate for trials.

Policing after 1829

Law enforcement before 1829 lacked proper organization and was largely inefficient and every time, there used to be a public controversy as the members of the public was not satisfied with the role of policing. This situation led to the analysis of the prevailing policing system by then, through a committee formed by the members of parliament. Some of the findings made by the committee were make to make policing system standard and official; where those employed in the profession would also be well paid. The profession was also to be organized in a more civilian fashion as well as make it more answerable to the members of the public. These ideas were forwarded to the

Progress In Policing Essays On Change:

Progress in Policing Richard A. Staufenberger, 1980 This book of essays explores how well the police and their allies have responded to the challenges documented in the 1967 report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice a report which diagnosed weaknesses in policing and provided guideposts for reform The first essay focuses on the commission's conclusions and on the research findings concerning the proper role of the police It concludes that police officers spend a large share of their time on noncriminal matters Further the essay finds no reason to divert resources devoted to such activities into crime fighting and suggests four areas of potential research understanding the police response to different types of incidents educating the public concerning police calls improving police training and evaluating and rewarding officers for their performance of service functions Personnel upgrading is discussed in terms of the rising percentage of sworn minority police officers and women the development of more sophisticated techniques of personnel administration including selection validation and career counseling rising educational levels among officers and the growth of police unionism Developments in police organization operations and management that have occurred since publication of the commission's report are explored including innovations in team policing operational computer assisted methods and new performance indicators such as the use of citizen surveys Another essay assesses the progress in police community relations since the commission's report and concludes that although tension between police departments and minority communities is not so great today as in the 1960's the possibility of large scale violence still exists Police consolidation and coordination are evaluated in terms of recommendations made by the commission's report the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and the National Advisory Commission on Standards and Goals The reduction of small police agencies greater State and Federal involvement in police activity and greater recognition of the importance of community decentralization are predicted A final essay analyzes the importance of research and experimentation in police work and outlines some major findings on management of the patrol function the role of citizens in crime prevention police strategies for crime reduction and police productivity
