ABSTRACT

Developmental examination is part of the process of identifying children at risk of poor developmental outcomes. Development is a rapidly changing process with large variations within the population and for the same child, which limits the sensitivity and specificity of any examination method. There is now a good body of scientific knowledge and an evidence base for improving the examination method and clinical decision-making. The four main components of this examination are eliciting concerns, gathering information on social and biological risk factors, making structured observations of spontaneous and elicited behaviour, and interpreting findings with knowledge both of the features which raise significant concerns and of common behavioural phenotypes of developmental disorders. The focus of developmental examination needs to shift from simply 'measuring' development to informing the developmental profile of a child's needs and identifying children at risk of adverse outcomes. The objective of helping the child is best achieved when the interpretation of findings, management guidance and management plan are shared through good communication with parents, carers and other agencies.

INTRODUCTION

This article describes a developmental examination method which combines the scientific knowledge of developmental progression and social and biological risks with the tools of systematic enquiry and observation. It provides a practical stepwise approach for eliciting information on normative and qualitative aspects of developmental abilities to differentiate children with typical development from children who may have significant developmental impairments. It outlines key areas of associated psychological processes, knowledge of which is essential for making sense of children's developmental difficulties.

Developmental impairments are a heterogeneous group of conditions which start early in life and present with delay and/or an abnormal pattern of progression in one or more domains, for example, sensation, perception, cognition, language, communication, movement and behaviour. The complexity and severity of the impairment and its impact on the child's activity and social and educational participation is influenced by multiple biological, social and environmental factors which interact with each other.¹ Collectively, developmental impairments are common, with prevalence ranging from 5% to 15%.²⁻⁴ They are often associated with health and behavioural problems, and are linked with long term problems of social adaptation, learning and adverse mental health outcomes.⁵ There is now good evidence that early identification and early intervention improve the outcomes of children with developmental impairments.^{6,7}

Developmental examination is part of a multi-step process of early identification and management of developmental impairments (table 1). There are, however, wide variations in practice and a lack of agreement on how best to conduct this examination in a clinical paediatric setting. Subjective clinical impressions based on informal observations are often used, but they miss a significant proportion of children with problems, which may lead to delay in identification.⁸⁻⁹ Standardised tests of development primarily differentiate children at different levels of performance on that particular test. These tests are considered as the gold standard by some but may be impractical in terms of time, unsuitable for the child's comprehension or motor abilities, and often too narrowly focus on measuring development.¹⁰

Table 1 Process for identification of developmental impairments

	Objectives	Methods
Surveillance: universal, for all children	Promoting health and development; promotion of good care and parenting; identification of risk factors; early presumptive identification of developmental difficulties ¹¹	Ongoing process involving parents (through the use of the Personal Child Health Record), health visitors and general practitioners ¹²
Developmental examination	To verify concerns, and elicit and categorise developmental function and any likely risk or impairment and arrange further assessment and/or investigations as required	Clinical evaluation based on the knowledge and skills of general paediatrics, developmental progression and the tools and method of examination
Developmental assessment: for established concerns	To provide a detailed description of the child's developmental strengths and weaknesses for management planning and monitoring	Standardised assessment methods, for example, Griffith's or Bayley's scales; psychometric assessment, for example, the Wechsler Intelligence Scale for Children (WISC)
Diagnostic or functional assessment	Diagnostic or functional assessment for management planning	Diagnostic tools, for example, the Autism Diagnostic Observation Schedule (ADOS) and Autism Diagnostic Interview (ADI) for autism; functional assessment tools, for example, the Gross Motor Function Measure (GMFM) for motor assessment
