

12 Project Procedures

(i) Procedure : This chapter discusses the many challenges facing the project manager. It illustrates the time-challenging environment the project manager has. The project manager (PM) is working for a large, internationally organized firm that has many projects running at the same time.

(ii) Project Management and the Project Manager

(a) The Project Manager versus the Project Manager : There is great difference between the functional manager and the PM. The PM has the idea of the PM. The functional manager is a functional specialist in the area he or she manages and that specialist is a big reason for or the in the manager. The functional manager experiences problems in handling things from a functional point of view. There is a functional culture based on his or her knowledge and experience. The PM is the value based, is a generalist who takes the project approach in solving problems. The PM handles general solving rather than solving solutions.

(b) Project Organization : The PM's organization can be divided into three categories.

(i) Responsibility in the project organization : This is the responsibility to make good use of the organization's resources. It includes keeping the project organization well informed on the status of the project.

(ii) Responsibility in the project : This is the responsibility to know that the project meets the customer's needs to agree on all the conditions described that the PM must meet.

(iii) Responsibility in the project team : This is the responsibility to manage the project team well. This includes good communication and keeping team members out of the project when it is required.

(iv) PM Career Path : The typical PM is one that has the same role without any career growth. Most organizations are managing the growth of a new career path for those whose interests are in the project and working up to figure out.

(v) Special Elements in the Project Manager : The PM must deal with elements that are unique to the project management environment.

(a) Managing Foreigner Managers : Modern managers are capable of not in their working in the management roles. This may be the biggest challenge because it requires understanding the fact that the organizational culture is different. It requires the PM to be able to work with a manager that is a native-born manager.

(b) Managing and Motivating Managers : Managers' interests are highly different from functional organizations. The functional manager does not want to have his or her own project, who are producing commercial products. The members of the project who are based on the project are motivated by the fact
