

STRATEGIES OF CURRICULUM IMPLEMENTATION IN NIGERIA: RIVERS STATE EXPERIENCEOwhonda, N. Mirian & Amadioha, SamuelDepartment of Educational Foundation, Rivers State University, Nkpolu-Oroworukwo, P.M.B 5080, PortHarcourt, River State, Nigeria*Email: mirianowhonda@yahoo.comAbstract

This study investigated curriculum implementation strategies in Nigeria. It discusses the general nature of curriculum implementation, the different approaches of curriculum implementation and factors affecting curriculum implementation. It highlights some of the curriculum implementation strategies used in Nigeria. This study posits that proper implementation of a new curriculum demands flexible planning, proper understanding of its purpose by the implementers, provision of time for questioning the new curriculum, correction for fine-tuning, provision of time to build trust, identification of those to be affected by the new curriculum by interacting with it and how it is to be implemented.

Introduction

When a curriculum is developed it should closely be followed by its implementation. If the curriculum was developed to address a current need of students and the society, in an ever-changing world then it must have strategies with which it will be implemented within the shortest possible time frame. If it takes too long to implement a developed curriculum then the chances of running the risk of implementing a curriculum that lacks relevance as well as lacking a target is created. Thus, speed of delivery and enlisting of all educators and the public are essential before the new curriculum will miss its educational target. This implies that when a new curriculum is developed but lacks a plan to incorporate them into the school's educational program quickly it may never be implemented at all or will be implemented at a time when it has lost relevance. More than 90 percent of new curricula fail to be implemented because educators lacked the managerial skills and knowledge necessary to deliver a new curriculum (Jon and Joseph, 2007). Educators in Nigeria may not be deficient in managerial skills and knowledge but may be too rigid in their thinking strategies regarding how to approach curriculum implementation. It is also possible for the educators to be overwhelmed by the ever-increasing rate of change and don't feel the full rush going on around them (John, 2014).

Basic Concepts and Nature of Curriculum Implementation

Implementation of curriculum in Nigeria requires restructuring and replacement, adjusting personal habits, ways of behaving, program emphases, learning spaces, and existing curricula and schedules (Leslie, 1976). In a rapidly changing and expanding times educators at all levels of schooling will have to change not only their knowledge sets regarding curricula and their creation and delivery, but also their mindsets too. It should be noted that the readiness with which teachers in Nigeria accept a new curriculum depends partly on the quality of the initial planning and the precision with which the steps of curriculum development have been carried out (Michael et al., 2006). Much educational reform has failed because those in charge of the efforts had little or a distorted understanding of the culture of schools (Seymour, 1990). Sarason notes two kinds of basic understanding essential to implementation:

1. The first is an understanding of organizational change and how information and ideas fit into a real-world context.
2. The second is an understanding of the relationship between curricula and the social institutional contexts into which they are to be introduced.

Those who educate must comprehend the structure of the school, its traditions, and its power relationships as well as how members see themselves and their roles. (Seymour, 1990). Successful implementers of curriculum realize that implementation must appeal to participants not only logically, but also emotionally and morally. Indeed, most teachers are motivated to action primarily by moral considerations (Pullan & Crevola, 2003). One's view of the social-institutional context is influenced by whether one perceives the world of education as technical

(modern) or nontechnical (postmodern). Those with a technical, modern, view believe that implementation can be planned down to specifics; those with a nontechnical, post modern, view hold that implementation is fluid and emergent. It is believed that the most productive stance regarding implementation is to view it
