

BIOGRAPHY OF ROBERT OWEN:

Prominently recognized as the 'father of British socialism', Robert Owen was a businessman, educational reformer, social activist and philanthropist, who remain as one of the most influential figures of the Industrial era. Throughout his life, he became devoted to advocating the theory that people were characterized by their environment and surroundings. Due to his philosophy, Owen sought to integrate more principled working conditions for factory workers and alleviate pauperism through the idea of socialism.

Roots and Early Life:

Born on the 14th of May 1771 in Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Robert Owen was the sixth of seven children. His father who acquired the same name as his son, served as a local postmaster but worked as an ironmonger and saddler while his mother originated from a prosperous farming family. Owen was an intelligent scholar who received most of his education from his local school, but discontinued to work at a draper shop in Stamford, Lincolnshire. At a youthful age of sixteen, Owen settled in Manchester and was employed at a large wholesale and drapery business.

Driven by the success of Richard Artwright's textile factory and the burgeoning textile industry, a nineteen-year-old Robert Owen founded a manufacturing business of spinning mules in partnership of John Jones. Though, he ended his collaboration with Jones, Owen obtained a job as a manager in Peter Drinkwater's flourishing spinning factory.

Later Life and Beliefs:

As a manager at Peter Drinkwater's company, Owen encountered numerous businessmen of which was David Dale, proprietor of the Chorlton Twist Company in New Lanark, Scotland. Later on, Owen was able to purchase four of Dale's enterprises through the financial support of businessmen from Manchester. Under the control and management of Owen, the Chorlton Twist Company prospered and rapidly expanded. However, despite his occupational accomplishments, Owen's firsthand experience as an industrialist ignited his aspirations to modernize and modify the current system of society during the industrial age.

Owen was a dynamic man who pioneered the concept that the surroundings of an individual was a salient aspect in the formation of their character. He perceived that people would be more motivated and willing
