

On the Foundations of Monopolistic Competition and Economic Geography: An Overview

Here we reproduce the table of contents and the introductory chapter to our book of related essays published by Edward Elgar.<sup>1</sup> These essays deal with the important implications of allowing for the distribution of goods in characteristic space and of producers in geographic space. Although several of the essays in this book are frequently cited, the overall view of the economy that together they imply, and is given in the introduction, has seldom been cited, presumably because it was not published elsewhere as were most of the other essays.<sup>2</sup>

Our overview stresses three ubiquitous phenomena: lumpiness, specificity, and diversity. We argue that taken together they undermine the neoclassical, competitive vision of the economy. The vision that emerges from our investigation of these matters is characterised, among other things, by overlapping oligopolies in many of its sectors; multiple, non-optimal, free-entry equilibria in which pure profits persist and history matters in determining which of the many possible equilibria are achieved; and several forms of rent seeking behaviours that only partially erode these pure profits.

Lumpiness: In the neoclassical world inputs are divisible and output technologies are convex. But it is a common observation that lumpiness is everywhere. Knowledge is costly to acquire and is non-rivalrous. A particular piece of knowledge can be thought of as a capital good with an infinite lump of embodied services. A particular piece of physical capital contains a strictly positive (but usually not infinite) lump of embodied services. As we argue in Chapter 16 both lumpy knowledge and lumpy capital goods imply an underlying non-convexity in the technology of production. Economic activity is also extremely lumpy in geographic space. Production is concentrated in geographic areas and specific sites. Consumption activity is also clustered geographically, and subject to important indivisibilities associated with transport facilities and personal shopping trips (Chapter 8 and Chapter 12). Similarly, the products that firms choose to make are not spread smoothly over characteristic space but are located as specific spots representing few of the full set of points in the space of imaginable products.

The Introductory Chapter is reproduced here by kind permission of the publisher. Of the 16 essays in the book, nine have been published in mainline journals. The others are less accessible, three being in University Discussion Papers and four in books of readings. One of these four, the most general of the surveys, "The Introduction of Space in the Neoclassical Model of Value Theory" was written in 1974 and published in a book that is apparently out of print.

G. Lipsey,Kenneth I. Carlaw,Clifford T. Bekar,2005-11-03 This book examines the long term economic growth that has raised the West s material living standards to levels undreamed of by counterparts in any previous time or place The authors argue that this growth has been driven by technological revolutions that have periodically transformed the West s economic social and political landscape over the last 10 000 years and allowed the West to become until recently the world s only dominant technological force Unique in the diversity of the analytical techniques used the book begins with a discussion of the causes and consequences of economic growth and technological change The authors argue that long term economic growth is largely driven by pervasive technologies now known as General Purpose GPTs They establish an alternative to the standard growth models that use an aggregate production function and then introduce the concept of GPTs complete with a study of how these technologies have transformed the West since the Neolithic Agricultural Revolution Early modern science is given more importance than in most other treatments and the 19th century demographic revolution is studied with a combination of formal models of population dynamics and historical analysis The authors argue that once sustained growth was established in the West formal models can shed much light on its subsequent behaviour They build non conventional dynamic non stationary equilibrium models of GPT driven growth that incorporate a range of phenomena that their historical studies show to be important but which are excluded from other GPT models in the interests of analytical tractability The book concludes with a study of the policy implications that follow from their unique approach
