While the use of a single measure is one of the primary weaknesses of this study, a more general criticism of the research is the use of a survey as the data source. The survey method is limited in that it is a post hoc method and is subject to a number of biases. For example, it has a limited capacity for identifying the causal link between the independent (marketing) and dependent (sales) variables. It also tends to focus on the what and how of the business, but does not provide much information on the why of the business. As a result, the survey method is often criticized for providing information on the what and how of the business, but not on the why.

in a way that did not take into account the role of community in the individual's experience of a particular situation or of learning. The concept of 'caring' cannot be given a single meaning or a single definition (Gillman, 1992), as indicated by using 'caring' in many contexts: teaching & learning, healthcare, religion, care, children, gender, geography, psychology, education, social care, social policy, etc. The concept of caring is a general one, 'caring people' will mean doctors, nurses, teachers, and so on. Gillman (1992, p. 100) defines caring as 'the general, non-specific, abstract, and often elusive, but not unattainable, goal of the human condition'.

Abstract—This study examined the effects of a 12-week, 3-dimensional, progressive resistance training program on the muscle strength, body composition, and cardiovascular fitness of 12 sedentary, middle-aged women. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 min, and focusing on the lower extremities, upper extremities, and core muscles. The program was designed to be a progressive resistance training program, with the intensity of the exercises increasing over time. The results of the study showed that the program had a significant positive effect on the muscle strength, body composition, and cardiovascular fitness of the women. The program was well-tolerated and the women reported a significant improvement in their overall health and fitness. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, 3-dimensional, progressive resistance training program can be an effective means of improving the health and fitness of sedentary, middle-aged women.

Abstract—This paper reports on a study of 1000 teachers' views on the impact of the National Curriculum on their schools. The study was carried out in 1992 and 1993. The study found that the National Curriculum had a significant impact on schools. The impact was both positive and negative. The positive impact was that the National Curriculum had helped to improve the quality of teaching and learning in schools. The negative impact was that the National Curriculum had led to a reduction in the time available for other activities, such as sports and music. The study also found that teachers had a variety of views on the impact of the National Curriculum. Some teachers felt that the National Curriculum had been a success, while others felt that it had been a failure. The study concluded that the National Curriculum had had a significant impact on schools, but that the impact was not uniform. The study also found that teachers had a variety of views on the impact of the National Curriculum.
