ABSTRACT

Background: Amniotic fluid embolism (AFE) is a rare and disastrous condition that occurs during labor or soon after delivery. Its course is abrupt and rapidly progressive and may result in cardiorespiratory collapse, profound hemorrhage and multi organ failure. Mortality and morbidity are high, with many survivors suffering major neurologic sequelae. Disseminated intravascular coagulation (DIC), severe coagulopathy and hemorrhage may pose a risk for extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (ECMO) therapy due to the need of full anticoagulation treatment.

Case Report: A 41 year old healthy parturient who developed fulminant AFE during cesarean delivery, accompanied by cardiac arrest, severe acute respiratory distress syndrome and DIC with profound obstetric hemorrhage. She was placed on veno-arterial ECMO as a rescue therapy and required more than 550 blood products. She had concomitant septic shock with E-coli bacteremia due to chorioamnionitis. Despite prolonged and complicated ICU course, including recurrent hemorrhage, multiple surgeries and sepsis, she survived to hospital discharge without neurologic sequelae.

Conclusion: ECMO therapy may be considered as a rescue therapy in AFE cases, refractory to standard cardiorespiratory support, despite the increased risk for hemorrhage under full anticoagulation therapy. Interdisciplinary coordination is mandatory for a good outcome.

Introduction

Amniotic fluid embolism (AFE) is a rare and disastrous condition that occurs during labor or delivery. It is a diagnosis of exclusion, and should be suspected in pregnant or recently

Profound bleeding and disseminated intravascular coagulation soon appear. Differential diagnosis includes peripartum hemorrhage, severe pre-eclampsia or eclampsia, pulmonary embolism, sepsis or septic shock and peripartum cardiomyopathy.

Diagnostic criteria were proposed by the society for maternal-fetal medicine (SMFM), including sudden onset of cardiorespiratory
