

Sherwood Anderson

Sherwood Anderson (1876-1941), American author, poet, playwright, essayist, and newspaper editor, wrote Winesburg, Ohio (1919), "The Book of the Grotesque". A collection of excellent examples of the short story genre and set in small town America, the stories are loosely connected by journalist George Willard writing of the sometimes "grotesque" sides of the human condition including poverty, marginalisation, love and romance. Many of Anderson's contributions to American Literature reflect his own struggles between the material and spiritual worlds as husband, father, author, and businessman and also cover issues as wide-ranging from labour conditions to marriage.

Sherwood Anderson was born on 13 September 1876 in Camden, Ohio to parents Irwin McClain Anderson and Emma Jane Smith. After many years during which the family traveled for Irwin to find work and Sherwood only periodically attending school, he moved by himself to Chicago, Illinois. He attended night school and worked various jobs including farm laborer, factory hand, and newsboy. He was a successful ad copywriter and served in the Spanish American War (1898-9).

Early on he was writing his own poetry and short stories, influenced by such notable authors as Carl Sandburg and Gertrude Stein. Possibly because of his early transient life and often straightened circumstances he became known for his stories that gave a voice to small town American characters and their plight with finding the American Dream. In Ohio, Sherwood met and married Cornelia Lane in 1904 with whom he'd have three children, Robert, John and Marion. A few years later he founded the Anderson Manufacturing Company, a successful firm carrying a popular product called "Roof-Fix". He enjoyed the fruits of the bourgeois lifestyle of family and a stable income but it was not long before he suffered a nervous breakdown and divorced Lane.

Sherwood Anderson, 1971 A Story Teller's Story Sherwood Anderson, 2007-03-01 A Story Teller's Story TO ALFRED STIEGLITZ who has been more than father to so many puzzled wistful children of the arts in this big noisy growing and groping America this book is gratefully dedicated A Story Teller's Story A STORY TELLERS STORY IN all the towns and over the wide countrysides of my own mid American boyhood there was no such thing as poverty as I myself saw it and knew it later in our great American industrial towns and cities My own family was poor but of what did our poverty consist My father a ruined dandy from the South had been reduced to keeping a small harness repair shop and when that failed he became ostensibly a house and barn painter However he did not call himself a house painter The idea was not flashy enough for him He called himself a sign writer The day of universal advertising had not yet come and there was but little sign writing to do in our town but still he stuck out bravely for the higher life At any time he would let go by the board the privilege of painting Alf Mann the butchers house it would have kept him busily at work for a month in order to have a go at lettering signs on fences along country roads for Alf Granger the baker There was your true pilgrimage abroad out into the land Father engaged a horse and a spring wagon and took the three older of his sons with him My older brother and the one next younger than myself were from the first adept at sign writing while both father and myself were helpless with a finish in our 3 hands And so I drove the horse and father supervised the whole affair He had a natural boyish love for the supervision of affairs and the picking out of a particular fence on a particular road became to him as important a matter as the selection of a site for a city or the fortification that was to defend it And then the farmer who owned the fence had to be consulted and if he refused his consent the joy of the situation became intensified We drove off up the road and turned into a wood and the farmer went back to his work of cultivating corn We watched and waited our boyish hearts beating madly It was a summer day and in the small wood in which we were concealed we all sat on a fallen log in silence Birds flew overhead and a squirrel chattered What a delicate tinge of romance spread over our common place enough business Father was made for romance For him there was no such thing as a fact It had fallen out that he never having had the glorious opportunity to fret his little hour upon a greater stage was intent on fretting his hour as best he could In a money saving prosperous corn shipping cabbage raising Ohio village He magnified the danger of our situation He might have a shotgun he said pointing to where in the distance the farmer was again at work As we waited in the wood he sometimes told us a story of the Civil War and how he with a companion had crept for days and nights through an enemy country at the risk of their lives We were carrying messages he said raising his eyebrows and throwing out his hands By the gesture there was something implied Well it was an affair of life or death 4 Why speak of the matter My country needed me and I and my intrepid companion had been selected because we were the bravest men in the army the raised eyebrows were saying And so with their paint pots and brushes in their hands my two brothers presently crept out of the wood and ran crouching through cornfields and got into the dusty road Quickly and with mad haste they dabbed the name of Alf Granger on the fence with the declaration that he baked the best bread in the State of Ohio and when they returned to us we all got back into the spring wagon and drove back along the road past the sign Father commanded me to stop the horse Look 1 he said frowning savagely at my two brothers your N is wrong
