The Evolving Geography of Productivity and Employment Elena Ianchovichina, 2024-03-22 The Evolving Geography of Productivity and Employment Ideas for Inclusive Growth through a Territorial Lens in Latin America and the Caribbean employs a territorial lens to understand the persistently low economic growth rates in Latin America and the Caribbean LAC Using new data and methods it shows that deindustrialization distance and divisions offer intertwined explanations for an urban productivity paradox in the LAC region its highly dense cities should be among the world s most productive yet they are not LAC cities have been held back by lack of dynamism poor connectivity and divisions into disconnected poor and affluent neighborhoods Deindustrialization has shifted urban employment especially in the largest LAC cities away from manufacturing and toward less dynamic low productivity nontradable activities such as retail trade and personal and other services that profit less from agglomeration especially in highly congested cities Although employment in urban tradable services has risen the increase has not been strong enough to offset the decline in manufacturing employment Meanwhile intercity connectivity issues have undermined the performance of the region s network of cities by restricting market access and firms ability to benefit from specialization in smaller cities Within cities poor connectivity and residential labor market segregation have limited the gains from agglomeration to neighborhoods in central business districts where formal firms operate Informality has persisted in low income neighborhoods where residents face multiple deprivations By contrast many agricultural and mining areas have benefited from the strong demand for commodities by China and other fast growing economies particularly during the Golden Decade 2003 13 leading to a decline in territorial inequality in most countries in the region The report concludes that to encourage inclusive growth countries must more efficiently transform natural wealth into human capital infrastructure and institutions and improve the competitiveness of the urban economy It then sketches out the contours of such a development strategy identifying policy priorities at the national regional and local levels
