Revolutionary Religion: Shia Islam and the Iranian Revolution

<https://www.e-ir.info/2019/09/03/revolutionary-religion-shia-islam-and-the-iranian-revolution/>

NATHAN OLSEN, SEP 3 2019

The Iranian revolution of 1979 saw a mass movement of diverse interests and political groups within Iranian society come together to overthrow the Shah. This would eventually lead to the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran in April 1979 and the creation of a new constitution that December. However, the movement to depose the Shah and the movement driving the construction of a new political system in Iran constituted two separate movements. As Moghadam (2002:1137) argues, 'Iran had two revolutions...the populist revolution...[and] the Islamic revolution'. In this essay, I will focus on the 'populist revolution' and the extent to which it can be labelled Islamic. This focus on the first revolution is important, as its nature is contested (Kurzman, 1995; Sohrabi, 2018). In contrast, the second revolution was undeniably Islamic: the successful referendum on the establishment of the Islamic Republic, the creation of an Islamic constitution and the enshrinement of Ayatollah Khomeini as Supreme Leader of Iran all support this notion. Thus, my essay will consider to what extent we can label the 'populist revolution' as Islamic. It will be argued that it is appropriate to use this label, as the revolution utilised the narrative and organisational structure of Shia Islam to build a mass movement powerful enough to overthrow the Shah (Nasr, 2007; Richard, 1995; Roy, 1994). However, the socioeconomic conditions and existing political movements which fostered a climate of change were secular in nature (Ahmineh and Eisenstadt, 2007; Kamrava, 1990; Abrahamian, 1982). Therefore, it is appropriate to label the Iranian revolution of 1979 as Islamic, yet we must recognise that it originated from secular demands. This essay will demonstrate the above argument by examining Iran's history of protest, considering the economic and political context of the 1979 revolution and evaluating the role that Ali Shariati's actions and ideas had on the revolution. The final section will examine the role that Shia Islam played in the revolution, focusing on the symbolic power of Karbala (Fischer, 2003).

Iran in the 20th Century: Revolution and Reform

To demonstrate the extent to which the Iranian revolution was Islamic, it is necessary to situate the 1979 revolution within Iran's long history of protest. This section will show that the Iranian revolution was Islamic, due to the role played by the Shia clergy in supporting the revolution. In contrast, previous uprisings have failed because the clergy either opposed calls for change or remained neutral in such situations. To survey the history of Iran from its foundation to the present day would be an overwhelming task to undertake, with Axworthy (2013:ix, emphasis mine) writing that Iranian history can be seen as a microcosm of human history as a whole: empires, invasions, revolutions'. Thus, I will focus on Iran's revolutionary history and examine whether the protests that preceded the 1979 revolution can be considered Islamic and what this tells us about the events in 1979.

Iran's constitutional revolution took place between 1905-1911, with a mass movement of people demanding the end of arbitrary rule by the state alongside economic modernisation. This provides us with an historical parallel to the revolution of 1979, which sought similar political and economic objectives (Katouzian, 2011:76-4). The constitutional revolution also "brought about the official recognition of the ulama as a part of Iran's governing elite for the first time" (Mozafari, 2011:73). It was this series of events, then, that would place the ulama (religious clergy) in a position of power within the state apparatus, a significant factor when considering the role that the ulama would play in the 1979 revolution. In his thorough analysis of the causes of the constitutional revolution, Abrahamian (1979) outlines the importance of both the dire economic circumstances in Iran at the time and the cohesive movement against the
