

ONE
TAINÉ, MARX AND ENGELS:
FROM POSITIVISM TO DIALECTICS

I. Taine: Foundations of the Sociology of Literature

The so-called sociological approach to literature regards literary works not as individual but as clearly social phenomena. Broadly speaking, the sociology of literature can take two directions.<sup>1</sup> The first focuses on the work itself, seeing it more or less as a 'mirror-image' of the society which gave rise to it. The conception of the literary text as a mirror has been greatly allowed, but we will discuss this problem later on. At this point, we should stress that for the sociologist, literature is viewed primarily as having documentary value. This can range from the crude idea that everything in literature is a photograph of real life, to the refined assertion that "information about reality has been presented to us by the human species in the form of narrative fiction. . . . In one sense, everything is fiction; in another, fiction is reality."<sup>2</sup> In this kind of approach to literature, sociology becomes intertwined with the study of history, anthropology, religion, etc.

The second direction focuses essentially on literature as a mode of production, mainly examining the situation of the producer (writer), the nature of the means of reproduction and distribution (publishers), and the situation of the market (reading public). In a technical sense, this is a more genuine sociological approach which tries to throw light on the relationship between the writer and the publisher within the framework of the capitalist market. The French sociologist, Robert Kailashit, has done some pioneering work in this direction,<sup>3</sup> and he is considered the leading expert in this field. We should mention of course that Sartre's essay "For whom does one write?" explores the socio-historical relationships between the writer and his patron (i.e. an abstracted or a publisher), and also between the
