

PREFACES, KNOWLEDGE, AND QUESTIONS

FRANK HONG

University of Southern California

The Preface Paradox is often discussed for its implications for rational belief. Much less discussed is a variant of the Preface Paradox for knowledge. In this paper, I argue that the most plausible closure-friendly resolution to the Preface Paradox for Knowledge is to say that in any given context, we do not know much. I call this view “Socraticism”. I argue that Socraticism is the most plausible view on two accounts — (1) this view is compatible with the claim that most of our knowledge ascriptions are true, and (2) provided that (1) is true, the costs of accepting Socraticism are much less than the costs of accepting any other resolution to the Paradox. I argue for (1) in Section 2 by developing a question-sensitive contextualist model for knowledge that shows how Socraticism is compatible with the claim that most of our knowledge ascriptions are true. I also argue how this contextualist model can achieve this result where other contextualist models fail. I then consider other closure-friendly solutions to the paradox in Section 3 and show how accepting those solutions forces us to give up a number of plausible epistemic principles.

“We know a lot”.¹ At least, that’s what one might think. But as has been noted by Hawthorne (2003), Benton (2017), and Hawthorne (2002), a preface paradox for knowledge may bring that assumption into question. Here is a variant of such a paradox. Consider Xin, a person who purportedly knows a lot, and at time t_0 she writes a lot of things she thinks she knows. They range from things she has come to believe on the basis of perception (e.g., that there is a dog in her backyard) to things she has come to believe on the basis of testimony (e.g., that the Battle of Hastings took place in the year 1066) to things she has come to believe on the basis of a priori deduction (e.g., that the square root of 2 is irrational). After producing her impressive book of purported knowledge, she suspects that there
