Stones, 2001 South Africa is a society that sadly has been divided against itself even at the best of times Beginning with the initial advent of colonialism on the southern tip of the African continent through to the later spawning of apartheid as well as in its nascent democracy divisions have continually been manifest in varying form and content along racial ethnic class religious language political or other socio economic and cultural lines Unlike most societies South Africa is a natural laboratory for psycho social research yet it has been foreign researchers who have conducted most of the behavioural studies on the human condition in the country South African psychologists seem to have steered clear of involvement in researching any major policy impact especially in recent times when the re shaping of South African society has been at its height Each of the authors in this book is South African and appropriately has lived through the transition in South Africa and has attempted to understand the changes at both professional and personal levels The contributors were each asked to write a chapter that would explore the South African socio political terrain from within their fields of expertise and so help others navigate the uncharted future with less trepidation Psychology of Liberation Maritza Montero, Christopher C. The Psychological Impacts of Apartheid on Black South Africans Susanna Harper, 2013-11-13 Seminar paper from the year 2012 in the subject History Africa grade 1 5 University of Education Freiburg im Breisgau language English abstract Apartheid was a highly colonial system Its main issue was not so much the segregation of races as the name suggests but rather the severe inequality that came with racial classification and segregation Because Whites believed themselves to be superior to people of colour they reserved for themselves rights and privileges which were not granted to members of other racial groups Consequently the life of Blacks Africans Coloureds and Indians was marked with restrictions prohibitions and ill treatment Recognizing Apartheid as a form of colonialism this paper espouses the argument that its legacy is not only one of physical or economic sequelae but also one of psychological damage on the former oppressed It attempts to prove that any form of ill treatment leaves some sort of psychological impact on the person concerned which then leads to a change in behaviour as an outward expression of his or her changed inner state For this purpose this paper will start out by giving a short introduction to the psychology of oppression Next it will look at the formation of the white South African mind set during Apartheid as the foundation and cause of oppression leading up to the main subject of this paper Finally chapter three will deal with the kind of treatment black South Africans experienced under the rule of the National Party and what psychological research has found out about the possible affects of such treatment Since most of the research done on Black psychology and the psychology of oppression stems from overseas countries such as the USA the literature used in this paper has a wide range Nevertheless it was endeavoured to continuously link the existing research to the South African context and situation A recent newspaper article on the importance of teaching struggle history at schools and a critical discussion on interracial marriages in modern South Africa first triggered my interest in studying the mind set of white South Africans during Apartheid This eventually lead me to my research question with the aim of wanting to find out more about the psychological impact this kind of mind set had on the country s oppressed population
