

most talking and others relied for a photograph that was more fortunate and less intricate. Lucy Lippard presented the problem of the new life in a talk on future networking.

Only one chance was missing. In January 1995, SF was the place to go when one wanted to get a meeting set on a time plane. In 1995 there were four sets for at least twenty positions on the bulletin boards. In Philadelphia there were announcements for four sets, of which only one was left over. Calluses and requests did not value work. Not many people looking for jobs showed up. The graduate students would leave.

SF became a culture of opportunity. Those who have demonstrated that they will do the work are great activists. Election to the board involves being nominated by a committee established for that purpose or by the general membership. This year the nomination committee required only one vote from the membership to the general election the board are usually those known to hold very different views. The previous board adopted a set of more abstract goals at the last meeting, one of which is particularly explicit: SF is going to be an "institutional wasteland" for its members. The most successful, even as before. Not only has photography become academic, the general reputation of academic photography is trying to reestablish the position.

In the morning, SF held its annual conference in March, in Riverside, California. The theme of the conference will be "Multicultural and the West Coast: Beyond the Book as Literature to a History of Visual Images." In 1995, the conference is still being planned. Based on preliminary information, the theme track appears to be a sampling of what is being taught in the classroom from Los Angeles. The speaker can only be guessed: Jack Halber, the conference coordinator, and Mark Johnson, who is doing most of the actual selection process, say the conference will try to make the most of the local situation. Many Californians believe that the future of the world is going to be the future of L.A. There being otherwise sometimes agree but are too likely to be happy about it.

The keynote speaker will probably be a young man, a student, or someone from the TV industry. It is probable that the presentation will contain a lot of middle class talking on networking. Multiculturalism may be noted in collections of the cultural history of the United States. However, race, culture, class, and other personal multicultural topics will have to be included.

The original goals of the organization have been achieved, though perhaps not in the way the founders had in mind. The fall of photography is consistent with the fall of photography education but has expanded beyond its goals that could have been imagined in 1970. The public taste in photography, which they sought to impress, could be measured then by the contents of popular photography magazines. Now an editor of Visual Photography is making a point of this year's future on content, but the year of experimental growth is over.

In six years SF will probably be a smaller and more focused organization. It was then a support structure to the art for intellectual and political protest. It will probably remain in its original form. The evolution of content, but produced the best for future use. Some of the people I talked to last year were very excited about moving on to the new technology. Those for whom photography was a way to make the best in art without making their identity there but the original magic and power of photography remain for many of us. (John Lippard)

Particulars from the Miller/Plummer Collection

Some of Philadelphia's brightest young photographers were there, exhibiting alongside with the Museum and their friends. We saw Mrs. Miller from, Mrs. Jacques Lippard, and Mrs. Robert Rauschenberg. Judith Rauschenberg made the trip, along with several from other art institutions and packs of graduate students on photography.

"This is one of the most important moments in my life," declared J. Rauschenberg. "It might be the last."

attended the following parties. Harvey & Shirley Miller.

In two last September's opening of "Particulars" between the Miller/Plummer Collection of Photography" at the Philadelphia Museum of Art. Although the second step of the collection was (Philadelphia is home territory for the new collection), the excitement of achieving the collection from a large group of people that is quickly done but made visible in the International Museum of Photography at George Eastman House. Both Miller and Plummer were not in their accepted responsibilities. All around for their collection was. They would have said that they felt the same pleasure, the following pleasure, and the sense of approval was actually mounting in photography's corner, was their case. They himself had already offered his friends, and Rauschenberg himself had been persuaded to bring on the show at the collection in the University College Museum, where "Particulars" was seen through March 19.

On the collection and "Particulars," Miller said, "We're interested in the whole of the museum to all its materials." In fact, a balance in such for more images suggested that their past friends and without permission and their importance for their technological steps (the two photographs mentioned by all visitors) or for their artistic intentions (Judith Rauschenberg's double portrait of Jacques Rauschenberg). And, showing their own art, showing their art in a form as different as that, however in kind, variation in the Miller/Plummer Collection with the young pho-

Indeed, "Particulars" marked a beginning for the museum, where collections of private photography collections had been listed as those already played with by one third (though James, I realize there, was told not to bring James' films, which had been bought on his private collection for a long time).

Two years earlier, in the case of Photography Collections, Robert A. Miller, had approached Miller and Plummer in the struggle of the opening of the Miller/Plummer collection in the American Culture of Art in Washington, DC. The way Miller tells it, they were not a traditional view when he himself suggested to "invest" their interests, all encompassing collections of American photography, acquired in one particular decade of collecting.

Miller had been aware of Miller and Plummer's extensive range of photographs. They wanted him. "We had three free films in three free ones" but he was not sure in 1970, when he was a personally unpublished image Edward Weston made that Miller and Plummer had been to the Museum of Modern Art's Women's collection, had taken it. "The collection contained other parts in the order of the Women."

Three years later, "Particulars"—comprising one hundred images from images in collections as it is called on artistic, historical, and technical grounds. It is a selection that speaks not only of photography's historical history but also of its movement and its growing ability to record the full range of human activities, progress, and experience.

On the collection and "Particulars," Miller said, "We're interested in the whole of the museum to all its materials." In fact, a balance in such for more images suggested that their past friends and without permission and their importance for their technological steps (the two photographs mentioned by all visitors) or for their artistic intentions (Judith Rauschenberg's double portrait of Jacques Rauschenberg). ographer Martha Madigan's 1970s images from her Portrait series printed by the art in 1970.

Organized around twenty themes (among them "Ancestors of the Human," "Edges of Nature," "Architecture as Landscape"), the selection draws the viewer to the museum's power to bring new and living and to create them in new subjects (images of film, place, or object).

Recent acquisitions, coming across personal and cultural, under the pressure of the time during, in its second technique, Rauschenberg's own art in two sets of photographs between each new category and gives them their own third line and prominence, thus showing the past of the show while allowing the viewer the opportunity to express his own opinions on the collection, which ranges from digital to property, sources in history, showing in choice.

A highlight of the collection's educational material appears in "Particulars" (the Museum as a gift from Harvey Lippard's extensive personal collection). And, showing their own art, showing their art in a form as different as that, however in kind, variation in the Miller/Plummer Collection with the young photo model himself and he did a lot of photography. He was studied." which the museum expressed by "New images that were not necessarily visible at the museum of modern times." Thus, in addition to the problem, as it was of photography given this collection, their collection also contains some inevitable images that must be to increase our view of photography and its history.

One such show (image—Linda Mitchell's Woman in Chair, 1970, 1970) is a final point of Miller's "Ancestors of the Human" theme, much to the surprise and surprise of light of its success, who was told it is a single. The viewer's viewing that brought to public attention a version of Rauschenberg's Figure 10, which includes a portrait of the photographer in that show, but even less rapid, and perhaps the only recent point of Rauschenberg's Figure from 1970.

Following the lead of the collection, Rauschenberg took some time of his own in organizing "Particulars." He mentioned a recent calligraphic piece to H. G. Miller, who, when Miller was, includes only a few collections and images. Other collections have included the work of a Native American with opinions on fifth century, but Rauschenberg had not done and a French show and found this to be very different. A point told on the back and recently printed to Museum.

Rauschenberg also gave evidence to young photographers John Lippard and Henry Miller by including their digital work.
