

Chapter 7 - Classification of Igneous Rocks
2024_0026 update

7.1 Magma and Igneous Rocks

Igneous processes form cooled or crystallized products whose texture (grain size-shape-relationship) provide evidence on the nature of processes that have occurred.

Magma temperatures generally fall in the 800°C - 1200°C range. Temperatures are highest for magmas that form deepest in the earth (upper mantle), and lowest for magmas that either formed by melting in the crust, where temperatures are lower compared to the mantle, or else are low because of protracted cooling and crystallization of an initially hotter (more mafic) magma.

The minerals that form in an igneous rock depend primarily on magma chemistry, and to an extent on cooling rate (a thin lava flow might cool too quickly to form any crystals). Table 7.2 explains the 4 classification terms used to sub-divide igneous rocks, based on minerals percent: ultramafic, mafic, intermediate, and felsic. Know what these terms mean, and generally what minerals you'd expect to find in each.

The names and relative %'s of minerals in an igneous rock depends on the chemistry of the magma, and whether it cooled quickly (so, perhaps only a few % crystals occur in a glassy or fine-grained matrix), or slowly (so, the entire magma was able to form crystals). Magma chemistry depends on the mineral composition of source rocks that melted to form the magma, the % melting (almost never is there enough heat in the earth to allow a rock being melted, to achieve 100% melting status) and to an extent, the depth of melting (which influences which minerals might be present and still remain in the source area, after a magma has formed and moved upward some distance towards the surface). Some post-melting processes (such as assimilation of wall rocks surrounding a magma body in the crust, or crystallization and loss of crystals from the system) can also change the magma's chemistry after it forms but before it is fully cooled. Table 7.1 summarizes 4 terms and % SiO₂ (by weight) of the rock, used to contrast the chemistry of igneous rocks: ultramafic, mafic, intermediate, and acidic.

Be familiar with the igneous rock terms in the list below, based on mineral differences driven by chemical composition of the magma:

- Peridotite
- Basalt vs. Gabbro
- Andesite vs. Diabase
- Diabase vs. Granodiorite
- Rhyolite vs. Granite

Some igneous rock names are based on textures rather than mineral composition. Examples include pumice, scoria, obsidian, tuff, breccia - terms that will be discussed later in the book.
