Abstract

Purpose – The purpose of this paper is to determine the preliminary clinical utility of a telephone-support format of the “Signposts” (Hudson et al., 2003) behavioural intervention programme to be used with a paediatric traumatic brain injury (TBI) population.

Design/methodology/approach – Nine families caring for a child with moderate or severe TBI, participated in a pilot study of a TBI adapted “Signposts for Building Better Behaviour” manualised programme. The programme is designed to help parents learn positive parenting skills and strategies that empower them to successfully manage their child's challenging behaviour post-TBI. The programme consists of seven core sessions and two supplemental sessions. Parents work through the sessions with an accompaniment of guiding information booklets, a DVD with scenes modeling positive parenting strategies, and a workbook containing written exercises. At the completion of each session parents receive a telephone-support call from a trained Signposts practitioner who provides assistance and feedback on programme content.

Findings – On average parents completed eight sessions (range seven to nine) and every family completed the seven core sessions. Participation in the telephone-support calls was high with 96 per cent of calls having been successfully received by families. All parents agreed that the telephone calls were a useful part of the programme and felt that the materials were helpful for managing challenging behaviour. Paired-samples t-tests showed significant reductions for challenging behaviour from pre- to post-intervention. Parenting practices also significantly improved over the course of the intervention. In general, parents rated a high level of consumer satisfaction with the Signposts programme and its content.

Originality/value – Overall, these preliminary findings support the potential clinical utility of a telephone-support version of the Signposts programme to improve parenting skills and to reduce challenging child behaviour following TBI. This study has provided the impetus for a larger clinical research trial to be conducted.

Introduction

Challenging externalising behaviours including impulsiveness, affective instability, disinhibition, social impropriety, oppositional-defiance, and aggressiveness are common sequelae of traumatic brain injury (TBI) in children (Cole et al., 2008; Dooley et al., 2008; Levin et al., 2007; Prigatano et al., 2010; Yvisaker et al., 2007). Compared to “mild” TBI, a “moderate”, or “severe” brain injury is more likely to result in these types of post-injury behavioural displays (Asarnow et al., 1991; Schwartz et al., 2003; Max et al., 1988). In saying this, a minority of children with mild TBI are equally susceptible to these issues (McGrinlay, 2009; McGrinlay et al., 2009).

Irrespective of injury severity, challenging behaviours prevent the injured child from engaging in activities that may enable them to function and interact with their caregivers, and more broadly with those in the wider community (Emmerson et al., 1988). It has been reported that as many as 70 per cent of children with severe TBI will demonstrate challenging behaviours that did not
